Meanwhile Washington had become greatly disturbed over the Philippine situation. Almost overnight the United States had developed into a potential empire and both the people and the leaders were having a hard time to adjust themselves to the new outlook. The country began to divide sharply into two camps outlook. The country began to divide snarply into two camps—the imperialists and the anti-imperialists—and both sides exhibited considerable strength. So far as Cuba was concerned, it was not regarded as a permanent American possession. Even before its occupation by American troops Congress had gone on record as disavowing any permanent designs upon the island. It had, in fact, promised that as soon as the Cubans themselves could set that as soon as the Cubans themselves could set up a government the Americans would withdraw. But no such definite promise existed in the case of the Philippines.

They had come to us, official Washington asserted, as an accident of war (although there is plenty of evidence that the "accident" had been planned carefully well in advance of its actual occurrence). And, since we had taken them over, we could not simply throw them on their own resources. They had to be themselves did not look upon the matter in the same light; that the insurgents believed firmly in their own ability to run their own affairs. Anxious dispatches were sent to Dewey and Anderson, warning them against committing the United States to any definite policy with regard to the native movement.

The treaty of Paris had been signed and by its terms the Philippines were to be purchased by the United States for $20,000,000, but the pact had not yet been ratified by the Senate, and so the

but the pact had not yet been ratified by the Senate, and so the situation on the islands—and in Washington—was rather confused. The Americans held Manila; the insurgents controlled most of the outlying territory; while Spaniards remained in a few isolated posts. With the ratification of the treaty Spain could withdraw, but still there would be two armies in the Philippines, neither of which was anxious to relinquish control to the other. Any lingering hope the Filipinos may have had that the United States was going to grant them independence died when President McKinley, in December, 1898, several weeks before the ratification of the treaty, issued a proclamation ordering the troops to extend American authority over "the whole ceded territory." He referred to the American "rights of sovereignty" and to the immediate necessity for exercising that sovereignty by extending the military government. The proclamation was so direct an attack on Aguinaldo's hopes that General Otis, who had become commander of the American forces, attempted to censor it before making it pubthe American forces, attempted to censor it before making it public. Through an oversight, however, the original draft was published and the tenseness of the situation was increased.

It is probable that so definite an avowal of the American attitude would have resulted in war under any circumstances, but critics of the McKinley administration contend that the Americans, not the Filipinos, were responsible for the actual outbreak. It is conceded that even after publication of the proclamation Aguinaldo made no warlike move. He even watched peaceably while the American military government extended its grip on the islands. Then, just two days before the treaty was to come up in the Senate for ratification, an American sentry shot and killed a Filipino who had encroached on a "dead line"; there was firing on Filipino who had encroached on a "dead line"; there was firing on both sides and a long and bloody war had begun.

The critics point out that the outbreak occurred at a very crucial moment. In spite of a vigorous campaign on the part of the imperialistic group, it appeared that the Senate was going to reject the treaty by about 2 votes. If one or two Senators could be persuaded that the Filipinos were entirely incapable of self-government, the day might be won; otherwise the outlook for an American empire was dark. The outbreak, which dispatches from Manila described as having originated in the insurgent camp, probably saved the treaty, for it was ratified by the requisite votes, with none to spare. with none to spare.

As early as 1899 President McKinley had sent a commission of civilians, headed by Jacob Gould Schurman, to study conditions on the islands for the purpose of establishing a civil government. There was not much the commission could do, however, since the military government was still in complete control and the war was still being waged. The same conditions existed the following year when the Taft Commission reached the islands, but by this time Washington felt that it had to set up at least the skeleton of civil government in order to justify the American Taft, naturally, had some skirmishes with the military before he was able to progress very far in the establishment of a civil organization, but he persevered and, with increasing support from Washington, soon succeeded in erecting a framework upon which a peace-time government later was built. In March, 1901, which a peace-time government later was built. In March, 1901, Congress passed the so-called Spooner amendment, which provided for a civil government. Later in the same month Aguinaldo was captured in a spectacular coup engineered by Colonel (later General) Funston, and on July 4 Taft was formally inaugurated first civilian governor of the islands. By that time the insurrection had dwindled to minor proportions, although the Philippine desire for independence was in no wise diminished.

Taft served as governor only until 1904, but the period 1901–1913 is regarded as something of a "Taft regime" in the Philippines. From the governorship he stepped into the office of Secretary of War, and the islands were directly under the control of his department. Later, as President, he still was in a position to guide the Nation's policy with regard to its island possessions. Whether this régime was bad or good seems to depend entirely on

Strong advocates of Philippine independence assert that it was bad; that as civil governor Taft installed a "white man's government" on the islands, reserving a preponderant balance of power to American citizens and stifling the political ambitions of natives by refusing to take even those appointed to important positions into the inner councils. It is asserted that the first civil governor's acts were guided by the desire to convert the natives to the idea of American domination and to make them forget about political autonomy. He conceded that the natives might some day be capable of self-government, but he expressed the hope that by that time they would be so well satisfied with the good resulting from union with the United States that there would be no desire for separation. In any event, he postponed the ultimate desire for separation. In any event, he postponed the ultimate decision for "several generations," which did little to pacify the island agitators and their American sympathizers.

Setting aside the question of whether the Filipinos were entitled to immediate independence, however, it should be possible to judge the Taft régime simply on its merits as an agency of colonial administration. In that light it shows up quite favorably.

Working with a populace which at its worst was hostile and at best was unsympathetic, Taft and the Governors General who succeeded him were able, nevertheless, to effect a number of political, social, and financial reforms which must be entered on the credit soid of the ledger. They built roads, founded public schools, introduced modern sanitation and established an efficient public health organization. Municipal and provincial police forces were organized throughout the islands to maintain order and a system of courts was established. After these reforms had been in effect for some time there was a marked decrease in the Philippine death rate and an equally marked increase in literacy. The finances of the islands were sound and violent outbreaks against the established order became more and more rare.

Nevertheless, the undercurrent of discontent remained. The Filipinos, of course, had to pay all the costs of the new government through taxation and many of them felt that the burden was unnecessarily large and unfairly distributed. They objected particularly to an export tax levied against all goods leaving the island, and they resented the fact that, although they belonged to the United States, their exports to the parent country were not exempted from tariff payments. Tariff concessions were made earlier, but it was not until 1913 that unlimited free trade was authorized by Congress and the offensive export tax abolished.

earlier, but it was not until 1913 that unlimited free trade was authorized by Congress and the offensive export tax abolished.

On the face of things the Filipinos do not seem to have fared so badly in the field of politics. In 1901 three natives were appointed members of the Philippine Commission and in the following year provision was made for the election of provincial governors. Taft himself had proclaimed a policy of filling all possible public positions with Filipinos and of increasing their number as rapidly as conditions warranted. His successors in office followed the same general policy. If it is true, as come contend, that all the "fattest" jobs went to Americans, it is also true that the number and percentage of Filipinos in public office increased greatly as time went on and as, in the view of the governors, they demonstrated their capacity for government.

In 1907 an important step was taken in the direction of representative government—the Philippine Assembly was organized and assumed legislative functions hitherto reserved to the commission. The latter body, however, still acted as an "upper house." In the same year two Philippine Resident Commissioners were sent to Washington and in 1908 a native was appointed to the post of secretary of finance and justice—the first to hold a portfolio in the government. Gradually, in the period prior to 1914, the Filipinos were taking an ever-increasing part in the handling of their own affairs. But the never-tiring advocates of complete independence contended the changes were changes of form, not of substance. The Governor General still retained a veto power; Congress still might nullify any of the acts of the assembly and the stance. The Governor General still retained a veto power; Congress still might nullify any of the acts of the assembly and the President of the United States was the final court of appeal in case of a dispute between the governor and the legislature.

There was widespread rejoicing on the islands when the Wilson administration came into power, for Philippine independence had been one of the planks in the Democratic platform. And administration came into power, for Philippine independence had been one of the planks in the Democratic platform. And there was even greater rejoicing when, in 1914, the Senate passed the Jones bill, calling for the complete withdrawal of the United States in not less than two nor more than four years. But, as had been the case back in 1898, when Aguinaldo optimistically hafted America as "liberator," the celebration was premature. The bill went to the House, then into conference, and emerged with the "two to four years" clause deleted. Even so the nationalists were not downhearted, for the final draft of the measure did include the first definite statement of Philippine policy ever made by Congress:

"It is and always has been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein."

In addition, the Jones bill provided for such changes in the existing government as were necessary to give the Filipinos a real chance to demonstrate their ability to govern themselves. The Governor General, Francis Burton Harrison, in accordance with the terms of the act, replaced practically all of the American officials with Filipinos. And the latter, for the first time, were permitted to formulate and carry out their own governmental policies. For the time being the agitation for immediate independence subsided and the islanders turned their efforts to the establishment of a government which the United States would be forced to recognize as stable.

the establishment of a government which the United States would be forced to recognize as stable.

From 1913, when Harrison succeeded W. Cameron Forbes as Governor, until 1921, when Gen. Leonard Wood succeeded to that position, the achievements of the native government in specific fields may be used as an index to its ability and stability. In that interval the enrollment in public schools increased from 440,000 to 1,100,000, and the number of schools and teachers was more than doubled. In 1913 there were only 2,035 kilometers of first-class roads on the islands; by 1921 this figure had been increased to 4,693 kilometers. During the Forbes administration there were no public dispensarics in the Philippines, but in eight years the Filipinos themselves had established more than 800 centers at which free medical advice and treatment might be obtained. The hospital facilities of the territory were increased greatly and effective measures were taken to lower the infant greatly and effective measures were taken to lower the infant mortality rate.

President Wilson was so impressed with the progress made President Wilson was so impressed with the progress made during his administration that, in December, 1920, he informed Congress that all the conditions set forth in the Jones Act had been met and that the Philippines, consequently, were entitled to their independence. Once again there was rejoicing on the islands and once again it was followed by gloom. For before Congress reached the point of action the Wilson administration came to an end and Harding became President. One of his first acts was to send General Wood and Mr. Forbes to the Philippines as an investigating commission.

Both of these men were well known on the islands, since the former had served there in a military capacity and the latter as governor, but their appointment was not greeted with any great enthusiasm by the nationalists. Both had gone on record preenthusiasm by the nationalists. Both had gone on record previously as opposing independence, and the Filipinos had no reason to believe that they had changed their minds. Without questioning the honesty or integrity of the two commissioners, the advocates of independence charged that Harding had picked them deliberately for their known views on the subject—because the administration already had made up its mind to keep the islands a while longer. Wood and Forbes reported that great progress had been made by the native government, but they recommended that the Filipinos be given more time to "absorb and master the powers already in their hands."

Moreover, the commission recommended that the powers of the legislature.

American governor be increased at the expense of the legislature, and when Harding appointed General Wood governor of the islands the latter at once began to carry out his own recommendation. He met with vigorous opposition on the part of the native leaders, who claimed that he had arrogated to himself power over the island population greater than that of the American President over his people. During the Wilson régime the hope of independence had served to divert nationalist energies into constructive channels. Now with that here dimension that tive channels. Now, with that hope dimmed, they began a concerted attack on the handiest target—which happened to be General Wood.

Because of his alleged high-handed methods a number of Filiplno Government officials resigned their posts, and in 1924 a commission headed by the speaker of the Philippine House of Representatives arrived in Washington to present a list of grievances to the President. It was after they had presented their petition to Coolidge and while they were still in Washington that the cause which they espoused received another serious setback.

In spite of the administration attitude, Congress had displayed strong sympathy for the cause of Philippine independence. In a strong sympathy for the cause of Philippine independence. In fact, while the island delegates were awaiting action on their petition an independence bill had been reported favorably from the House Insular Affairs Committee by a vote of 11 to 5. Its passage, in view of the committee's vote, seemed assured, and once again there was celebrating in the nationalist camp. Then Mr. Coolidge stepped in and put an end to the rejoicing. His reply to the grievance petition was brief and, according to critics, vague and uncertification, but it left no doubt as to the firmness of the ed-unsatisfactory, but it left no doubt as to the firmness of the administration's opposition to immediate independence:

"The extent to which the grievances which you suggest are shared by the Filipino people has been a subject of some disagreement. The American Government has information which justifies ment. The American Government has information which justifies it in the confidence that a very large proportion, at any rate, and possibly a majority, of the substantial citizenry of the islands does not support the claim that there are grounds for grievances."

This letter was immediately effective in blocking the expected congressional action, and it served also to rouse a storm of criticism from the Filipinos and their American sympathizers. Whence, these asked, came the Government's "information" which implied that a majority of Filipinos were satisfied with things as they were? And just what was the nature of the information and why was it not revealed in the President's message? The questions were not answered, nor was the situation altered. The questions were not answered, nor was the situation altered. The Philippine problem had been sidetracked casually but firmly, and the independence agitators had to start all over again.

Undoubtedly more complications are involved in America's Philippine policy than meet the eye of a casual observer. It is extremely difficult to believe that, when we took the islands from Spain, we were guided solely by the lofty and altruistic motives enunciated at the time. Twenty million dollars is a high price to pay for altruism and the cost of "purchasing" the islands was only a fraction of the cost of keeping them during the early years of American occupation. Moreover, it is hard to reconcile our alleged yearning for the peace and welfare of a helpless people with the yearning for the peace and welfare of a helpless people with the casualty lists of the insurrection.

Going back to 1898 it is not difficult to discover the motives which really dictated the early stages of our insular policy and which, perhaps, have influenced it profoundly ever since. While McKinley was issuing his humanitarian appeals for public consumption he was also conducting important investigations which at the time were kept discreetly quiet. In August, 1898, a commission was sent to the islands to "investigate and report on financial and industrial conditions," and its report, submitted some time afterward, spoke glowingly of the commercial prospects inherent in the proper exploitation of Manila hemp. In the same year the President dispatched a confidential inquiry to Admiral Dewey:

"The President desires to receive from you any important infor-

"The President desires to receive from you any important information you may have of the Philippines, the desirability of the several islands, the character of the population, coal, and other mineral deposits, their harbor and commercial advantages, and in a naval and commercial sense which would be the most advantageous."

On the basis of this evidence and in view of the rapidity with which American capital established itself on the islands it is possible to reach the conclusion that commercial considerations were weighed carefully in the formulation of our Philippine policies. Many advocates of Philippine independence charge that these same commercial considerations have been responsible for the failure of Congress to take definite action on the several occasions when such action seemed imminent.

Regardless of the motives which guided it, a great deal may be said in favor of American rule on the islands. If we exclude the period of the insurrection it has been, on the whole, an excellent example of colonial government. The succession of men who have ed the destinies of the islands have been almost without exception enlightened, able, and considerate. Under exceedingly difficult circumstances they have maintained peace and promoted progress, with the result that, by American standards at least, the Filipinos are better off to-day than they would have been without American aid and advice.

Opponents of separation point out that the progress of the last quarter century can be maintained only so long as the islands remain dependent and, again purely from the point of view of American standards, they may be right. On the other hand, those who sympathize with the Nationalists point out that the Filipinos are entirely capable of running their own affairs. Moreover, it is held, they want to, and have wanted to, ever since 1898. It is pointed out that the islanders are virtually of one mind in this respect and that every session of the legislature since its organization in 1907 has petitioned unanimously for separation. It is argued that the very foundation of American Government is a argued that the very foundation of American Government is a recognition of the right of a people to choose how they shall be governed; and while claiming that right ourselves we have no right to deny it to others

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, an interesting letter addressed to Senator Hawes by General Aguinaldo, former President of the Philippine Republic, ably discusses the desire for independence of the Philippine people and their relations with our people. I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

St. Joseph's Hospital, Manila, July 25, 1931.

DISTINGUISHED SENATOR: I have read with care the questions you formulated on the subject of Philippine independence. My answers are herein conveyed in the form of a memorial which I have prepared for such use as you may deem convenient. I only regret that due to my confinement in this hospital it has not been possible for me to venture into a fuller discussion of the subject. I hope, however, that although the answers are incomplete you will have an idea of my points of view on the independence of my country.

I am thankful to you from the bottom of my heart for having I am thankful to you from the bottom of my heart for having requested an expression of my opinions on the salient phases of this question, so vital to all of us. The restoration of the Philippine Republic has been the principal longing of my life. That Republic we had erected after tremendous sacrifices; it was the compendium of our dreams as a nation subjugated for three centuries by foreign domination; it forms a part of our very being as a people as a people.

The efforts you are exerting to bring about the restoration of that Republic have the unanimous support of the Filipino people. To you and to your colleagues in the Congress who have assumed the difficult task of helping us in the campaign we all owe a debt of gratitude. In our hearts you will find the monument to your great work.

No one, I believe, without committing an injustice, could question the sincere and unanimous desire of the Filipino people to obtain their coveted independence. Our revolutions are proof of that desire. Since then the sentiment of the Filipinos regarding that desire. Since then the sentiment of the ringinos regarding their emancipation has not changed.

The insinuation that the popular expressions in favor of independence have been secured by intimidation is without justification. On the contrary, it may be said that the political leaders have had to declare themselves openly for independence, because a contrary behavior would have brought popular condemnation upon them.

The demand for independence by the Filipino people will be

The demand for independence by the Filipino people will be more and more pressing as the years go by, not only because of the innate desire of peoples for self-determination but also because of the assurances given by the United States through her legitimate representatives, both civil and military, that upon occupying these islands America did not entertain designs of exploitation but of emancipation. The delay, therefore, in the concession of independence serves only to accentuate the people's desire for liberation and at the same time to aggravate the political and economic situation of the country.

It is true that the concession of independence will usher in new domestic problems. But it is then that our statesmen could, and will, dedicate themselves to the consideration of those national problems, preferably the economic, which have been and will continue to be neglected and relegated to the background as long as our political situation is not defined in harmony with our agelong aspirations. If we recall our revolutionary epoch of 1896 and 1898, I may be permitted to state that at that time we faced grave internal problems under the dictatorial and revolutionary governments and later under the Philippine Republic, but, thanks governments and later under the Philippine Republic, but, thanks to the patriotism and civic spirit of our people, we emerged successful from the test to which Fate had subjected us.

What is more, I believe that when we are independent we shall have a better kind of democracy than that which prevails in the islands at present. As it is now, it may be said that we have only one political party. The opposition has always been weak, and this is attributable to the system whereby the majority party has intrenched itself formidably in power with the unconscious has intrenched itself formidably in power with the unconscious abetment of the representative of American sovereignty.

Twenty-four years have elapsed since representative government was inaugurated here, and yet the opposition party has not succeeded in coming into power. If things are to continue as they are now, I doubt whether the opposition, no matter what efforts it exerts, could ever succeed the majority party in the government. With independence the opposition will have a better chance; many national questions will be the theme of discussion; party responsibility and fiscalization will always be a serious issue. We could then expect periodical changes in party administration and the consequent betterment of the public service.

The possibility of a civil war or of a general disturbance is not an impediment to the concession of independence. Civil wars and uprisings have in many cases been the price which independent peoples have had to pay in order to consolidate their institutions. If it is written that the Filipino people shall pass through such a terrible ordeal, they will not hesitate to do so provided they a terrible ordeal, they will not hesitate to do so provided they could be masters of their destinies. Civil wars, however deplor-able, are often inevitable when constitutional means are impotent able, are often inevitable when constitutional means are impotent to restore the reign of law. But, despite all that, I do not believe in the possibility of a civil war or general disorder if independence is granted. By nature we are a peaceful people, lovers of public order, and it is not hazardous to affirm that if we are declared independent there will be a firmer union among the Filipinos brought about by the sense of a common responsibility and desire to support and elevate the country redeemed. This was the case in the days of the Philippine Republic.

With the termination of the present uncertainty in the relations

With the termination of the present uncertainty in the relations between the Philippines and the United States public attention will be concentrated on our economic problems, capital will emerge from its retirement, and, as a result, the material progress of the country will be emancipated from its present stagnation.

I believe that a delay of 20 or 30 years in the concession of Philippine independence will work irreparable harm to the cause of economic and political progress, aside from the fact that during such a long period of time new difficulties might arise which would necessitate further postponement of the grant. At present the country is literally mortgaged to the United States. Twenty years hence, therefore, the big interests will have intrenched themselves in such a manner and will commend such means as themselves in such a manner and will command such means as would enable them easily to stifle our future as well as our desires for emancipation. Those big interests which made the independence of Cuba a solemn fiction will, if Philippine independence were further delayed, make that independence an eternal aspiration impossible of realization.

If the present situation continue for 20 years more, at the end of that period the Philippines would be a political as well as an economic tributary of American capital. Individual initiative in the manhood of our race will have disappeared, and we will be nothing but a nation of bureaucrats and employees groaning beneath the thumbs of political chieftains, and whatever vestige of democracy we have now will then be a myth.

Other contingencies, too, might arise if the granting of independence were to be delayed further. The difficulties incident upon severance of relations will naturally increase a thousandfold. Various other new interests of the United States might be affected by the continuance of our association. Tariffs on our products will have to be imposed in the meantime if certain American industries are to be saved from extinction. A greater agricultural or industrial development here will have its telling effect on America's own agricultural and industrial interests. The severance of free-trade relations would seem to be inevitable. Congress could not prevent that even if it wanted to. The time, therefore, will surely come when the relations between America and the Philippines will be purely political; we will be a foreign country to her as regards trade relations, but politically we will be under her supervision and protection.

on the other hand, if independence were granted now it would stimulate our initiative as a nation. The idea of political dependence will disappear from our minds. We could begin to fashion the structure of our nationality in our own way. We shall grapple with our problems in accordance with our capacity and means. And we shall have an opportunity to be strong and really prosperous, a thing we never can accomplish under the typicage of such problem region.

The argument that we are not prepared for independence is gratuitous. And in the strict sense, we are not being prepared for independence anyway, even under the ægis of the United States. Where is the preparation for an army and navy, for aviastates. Where is the preparation for an army and havy, for aviation, and for aerial defense? Where is the preparation in diplomacy and consular service? It is true that much has been accomplished under American guidance; we have better roads, sumptuous government offices, a higher standard of living, and a sumptuous government offices, a higher standard of living, and a modern system of public instruction. Nevertheless, as the enemies of independence would interpret the word "preparation," we have not got it in spite of 30 years' tutelage. And two centuries from now we will be told the same thing.

The present uncertainty, as I have stated above, retards the economic development of the country. Capitalists have said that they do not care to make investments here in view of that uncertainty in our political status. If the uncertainty were terminated, the situation will change. Even in Bolshevistic Russia and in China, with its continuous civil wars, foreign capital keeps pouring in. It can be safely predicted, I believe, that once independent we also can get desirable foreign capital invested here. Our industries and financial growth will also be accelerated. The responsibilities attendant upon the changed status will be so great that our people will exert all their efforts to create more wealth with which to meet their obligations. This has been the experience of countries that have attained their independence.

experience of countries that have attained their independence. And the Philippines does not have to be the exception.

I would prefer the opening up of world markets for our products. We have many tropical products which are in great demand not only in the United States but also in other lands. If we could place those products in the markets of other lands besides, it would surely be to our advantage. With the possible exception of cotton and steel and machineries, we could produce the things we need locally. We do not need much for our daily living. Foodstuffs we could produce in abundance. The raw materials for the primary manufactures are here also in abundance. materials for the primary manufactures are here also in abundance. We could be in a position to compete in the markets of the world.

The free-trade relations we now have with the United States were established by the Congress. I do not remember that we have asked for this arrangement. It has been beneficial to the islands, to be sure; but from the point of view of our national destiny, it has deprived us of other markets and hence other chances.

The result of this free-trade arrangement is as follows: En-The result of this free-trade arrangement is as follows: Encouraged by the demand in the American market we have produced more sugar and we have also increased our production of oil and other products. But this increase is not now looked upon with favor by American agricultural interests, and we are being told to restrict our output, because we are competing with American products in the United States. At the same time we are told to develop our country economically if we desire to be free. It would seem, therefore, that we are between the devil and the deep blue sea.

free. It would seem, therefore, that we are between the devil and the deep blue sea.

I venture to assert, then, that the economic structure of the country will be more stable if we secure an access to other markets besides those of the United States, although, for reasons of gratitude and other considerations which we hold toward her, we would be willing always to consider America as the favored nation under equal circumstances.

I am convinced that the contemplated readjustment of free-trade relations should come after the concession of independence. Disposed as we are to face the consequences imposed by new obligations that will arise, our country will intensify its activities in all lines of endeavor with those new obligations in mind.

Necessity is the mother of progress, and on the necessities inci-

Necessity is the mother of progress, and on the necessities incident upon an independent government the Filipino people will construct the edifice of their prosperity and national greatness. On the understanding, therefore, that the adjustment regarding free trade should not precede the concession of independence, notwithstanding opinions to the contrary, I would suggest a period of not more than 10 years within which we hope to be able to adjust the economic difficulties attendant upon separation in a way satisfactory to both peoples. Let independence come at the earliest hour, however—at the latest within the next five years—inasmuch as the continuation of the present guardianship will kill our spirit of initiative as well as the characteristic elements of our nationality.

There is no doubt that the danger of a foreign invasion will be

There is no doubt that the danger of a foreign invasion will be greater when we are independent than now under the sovereignty of the United States, this in spite of America's commitment under the quadruple treaty that the Philippines will not be fortified further. The mere presence of the United States here, without necessity of fortifications, is sufficient guarantee against any possible danger of invasion. The country is perfectly aware of this advantage, but it can not sacrifice to it its independence ideal. It would be desirable, of course, if the principal powers of the Pacific could reach an agreement guaranteeing the neutrality of the islands. International relations are slowly evolving toward concord and peace, and a treaty of neutrality would be a good guarantee of the external safety of the Philippines in the future. But if there should be difficulties in the realization of such a treaty the country will not renounce its ideal because of those difficulties. The Filipino people desire their independence and they will pay the price that destiny might exact.

Our people have waged two revolutions, shed much blood, and sacrificed innumerable lives and fortune in order to attain their political independence; they are disposed now to forego the mate-political independence; they are disposed now to forego the material advantages they enjoy and even the greater ones they might enjoy in the future in exchange for their liberation. After all, these are transient advantages, and we have seen how, recently, a movement has been started, and is gathering momentum, to ter-movement has been started, and is gathering momentum, to terminate the present tariff relations between the Philippines and the United States. Hence, even under the present state of dependence, there is a possibility, not remote, of those advantages disappearing. The preservation of our public lands for the present and future generation of Filipinos is undoubtedly one of the serious problems which will require most careful study by our statesmen. The present laws, however, offer sufficient guarantees of protection for foreign and for local capital alike, and whatever attempt there will be to liberalize the present public land laws will meet with decided and vehement pepular protest. No political party would dare father a measure which would thus rile popular sentiment.

It has been argued that with the advent of independence there will be a backslide in the sanitary conditions of these islands. Nothing is more erroneous. The present sanitary service, which is a success, has been in the hands of Filipino officials for more than 15 years. In case of independence, therefore, the danger is not in a possible backsliding but in going ahead too fast, for then there will be greater desire to serve the country recently emancipated.

The so-called Moro problem has never existed and does not exist.

During the life of the short-lived Philippine Republic our Mohammedan kinsmen shared with us in the benefits of that government and abided by the orders and decrees promulgated. I repeat that there is no such problem. It has been fabricated by the enemies of independence in order to discredit us in the eyes of the Government and people of the United States. Our Mohammedan brothers are conscious of our desire and solicitude to impart to them the benefits of civilization enjoyed by the Christian Filipinos.

With respect to the oft-repeated Japanese menace, I would state that Japan has a noble rôle to play in this part of the globe as a nation which is at the vanguard of the other nations of the Far East. It would be a dark day for oriental peoples if Japan would

East. It would be a dark day for oriental peoples if Japan would seek to impose her sovereignty on every one of them. The awakening of China and other oriental countries during recent years is not a sign that would encourage Japan to entertain designs of suzerainty over the Far East. On the other hand, it would be to her advantage if she could have the friendship and good will of all her neighbors. Overlordship based on might has never endured. Week proples will not continue week forever. Always there all her neighbors. Overlordship based on might has never endured. Weak peoples will not continue weak forever. Always there have been upheavals resulting in their emancipation. National conclousness and the instinct of self-preservation have always saved nations, however small, from humiliation and disaster. There are, it is true, many more Chinese than Japanese in the Philippines. Whether, however, the Chinese constitute a menace to the country is something we can not as yet foresee. Indications are to the contrary. The Chinese here are peaceful and lawabiding. They do not bother the government nor their neighbors. They comply with their obligations and attend industrially to their industrial and commercial speculations in which it is hard to their industrial and commercial speculations in which it is hard to excel them. They mix with Filipinos, they intermarry with Filipino women, and their children become good Filipino citizens. A treaty on immigration between China and the Philippines would treaty on immigration between China and the Philippines would be good for the preservation of their friendly relations.

I believe that the fact that there are only about 7,000 Americans who have taken up their residence here is due to the distance from the United States and also to the climate here. Having been born and reared in surroundings vastly different from ours, the lure of home and of dear relations would be too strong for them to want to other horse all their lives.

Our feeling of gratitue toward the United States will be intensified with the grant of independence. This is but natural. America and her illustrious statesmen have repeatedly announced that her presence here is not actuated by selfish motives, nor is it for exploitation, but to aid us in the establishment of a representative system of self-government. We placed implicit faith in her word. Its fulfillment will be the occasion for rejoicing throughout the islands; it will strengthen our faith in the sincerity of the United States. To our people the waiting has been too long. Many Fili-pinos of worth who have fought for the freedom of the land have already passed on—they would have been glad to witness the restoration of the Republic they proclaimed and defended. If, on the other hand, the United States does not fulfill her promise, then the Filipinos will be convinced of the injustice that has been their fate; they will realize that all their efforts and sacrifices, in war and in peace, have been in vain, and that they made a great mis-take for which their children and their children's children will rebuke them, in having trusted in the word of the United States.

Reiterating my sincere gratefulness to you and to those other Members of Congress who are taking an interest in the independ-ence of my country, I am Very sincerely yours,

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

Senator HARRY B. HAWES, Manila Hotel, Manila.

LOUISIANA AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL LEGISLATION

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before proceeding with what remarks I wish to make, I send to the desk and ask to have read by the clerk an article appearing in the Washington Post.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the article? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read.

[From the Washington Post, March 19, 1932] JUSTICE IN LOUISIANA

The courts of Louisiana have decided that they have no jurisdiction over the gubernatorial tangle which Senator HUEY P. Long left at Baton Rouge when he came to Washington. In doing so they have nullified the election of Paul N. Cyr as lieutenant governor and given effect to the dictates of Senator Long.

When Doctor Cyr filed suit to oust Governor Long on the ground that he was a United States Senator, and therefore could not legally hold the governorship under the State constitution, the lower court ruled against him. But the Louisiana Supreme Court overruled that decision and held that the courts had no jurisdiction over the matter. It is obvious that the judiciary of any State is without authority to say when a Senator-elect becomes a Senator, but when the courts disavow jurisdiction over a dispute involving the governorship, it does seem as if they were sidestening.

In seating Senator Barbour, of New Jersey, the Senate held, in effect, that it is not necessary to take the oath of office to become a Senator. Mr. Barbour was appointed to succeed Senator Morrow, who had not taken the oath since the beginning of his 6-year term at the time of his death. In spite of that fact, Mr Morrow was held to be a Senator at the time of his death, and Governor Larson was therefore entitled to appoint Mr. Barbour to succeed him

This termination of the Barbour case leaves the strong presumption that Huer Long served as governor after becoming a Senator, in violation of the State constitution. Yet he was allowed to depose the elected and qualified lieutenant governor and to set up one of his own loyal confrères as chief executive. Now the courts support him in that action by saying that only the legislature has authority to remove a governor. Apparently the courts did not pass upon the question of the former governor's right to oust, with the aid of the militia, an official elected by the people. The new rule of upholding only those laws and protecting only the rights of those officials who have the approval of Huer Long may be popular in Louisiana, but it is not calculated to enhance the prestige of that State anywhere else.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Louisiana addressing the Senate at this time? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is recognized.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this campaign of newspaper editorials which has gone on in the State of Louisiana has apparently been transferred to Washington. It could not be possible that the number of editorials which have been appearing in the newspapers in Washington, particularly this paper, the Washington Post, could have simply been produced in those columns by chance or by accident.

The editorial which has just been read by the clerk would undertake to inform the ordinary public men of this Capital City that in the State of Louisiana the law was being administered by corrupted courts, that the courts were rendering decisions and handing down decrees in that State in accordance with the will of some one engaged in politics, and that there was no such thing as justice to be secured in that State.

This fight, however, is a little bit broader than the one the editorial entirely discloses. The fight began in the State of Louisiana when it should have begun in the Congress of the United States. It is just about reaching the climax in the Congress of the United States.

In 1928 I was elected Governor of the State of Louisiana by the largest plurality ever given to a candidate up to that time, I think. An impeachment flasco began one year later, with a lieutenant governor as the party seeking to become the Governor of the State of Louisiana. The impeachment was started when we proposed a bill to tax the Standard Oil Co. 5 cents a barrel on the business of refining oil to support the government of that State, as a result of which a state-wide gathering was called in the capital city of Baton Rouge to repel the undertaking to levy a tax on oil in that State of 5 cents a barrel.

At the same meeting an impeachment resolution was introduced, without any charges being specified at the mass meeting, at which some 100 musicians of the Standard Oil Co. furnished entertainment, the resolution stating that impeachment resolutions were to be filed in the house of representatives on the following day or so in order to make Dr. Paul Cyr the Governor of the State of Louisiana.

The lieutenant governor, Doctor Cyr, had been elected on the Long ticket, on a platform pledging that he was going to support that administration, and every man who supported that ticket knew that one of the provisions in its platform was a pledge to place the taxes in that State on the wealthy interests operating there who were in position to pay those taxes.

The impeachment move failed. Later on, Mr. President, I ran as a candidate for the United States Senate. My platform was that if I were to be elected to the United States Senate, I would not take the oath of office for one year and six months from the date of my election, but that I would remain in the State and serve out my term as governor before coming to the United States Senate.

A year elapsed. We went into another election, in which we proposed to submit to the people of the State of Louisiana again the issues, the verdict on which, by the people, a certain element in that State refused then and refuses now to accept at all, until everyone of them has been put out of office by the people. We went into the election with a ticket of nine candidates, who pledged themselves to undertake to complete the work of the Long administration in the State, and, Mr. President, every man on that ticket, nine out of nine, was elected in the State of Louisiana, and carried, out of 64 parishes, I think 56 or 57, or somewhere about that number.

The lieutenant governor, Doctor Cyr, in the meantime proceeded to take the oath of office as governor, and announced that he had abandoned the office of lieutenant governor. He refused to attend a meeting of the board of pardons, saying he was no longer lieutenant governor. He refused to attend a meeting of the board of liquidation of the State debt, saying he was no longer lieutenant governor. He refused to attend a meeting of the State highway advisory board, saying he was no longer lieutenant governor. He brought a suit and stood in court and said that he was Governor of Louisiana.

It has been held by four courts of last resort in the United States that when one renounces an office which he is holding and claims another office, whether the courts sustain him in his claim to the latter office or not, he forfeits all title to the original office which he held. The lieutenant governor apparently relied on those decisions, because the president pro tempore of the senate moved into the position of lieutenant governor and served as lieutenant governor for four months, until the Supreme Court of Louisiana finally disposed of the case and held that Lieutenant Governor Cyrhad not become the governor, and upon having abandoned the lieutenant governor's office the then acting lieutenant governor naturally, under well-founded jurisprudence, succeeded to the office of governor of that State when I took my oath here as United States Senator.

The courts of the State of Louisiana followed the decisions of four other courts of the United States and followed all of the jurisprudence that is relevant on this subject, considering the conduct of the then acting lieutenant governor, who abandoned his own office, and not only abandoned his office, but allowed the salary of that office to be paid to the president pro tempore of the senate, Mr. King; and after Mr. King had drawn the salary for four months, with a lieutenant governor who had been elected having abandoned his own office, taking the position that he had no right to draw his salary as lieutenant governor of the State, then. when the case was finally disposed of, no one could say that the then acting lieutenant governor, Mr. King, could do other than step into the office of governor.

Mr. President, if it had not been for this continuous line of editorial gossip, an attempt to have washed out in Washington the linen of Louisiana politics, I would not at this time undertake to say anything that might be adrift from the sole matter of answering the editorial which has just been read, but I am now going a little further, and I trust that Senators in just a few minutes will see that what I say is relevant and that it is consistent.

A statement was made on the 16th of March by Mr. Julius H. Barnes to which I want to refer. The headlines read:

Trust laws rapped by Barnes at board of trade gathering.

I read from the newspaper account:

The board approved 11 points of a referendum of the United States Chamber of Commerce in regard to Government tax and fiscal problems. The referendum indorsed the balancing of the Federal Budget for the year ending June, 1934, through decreased expenditures, borrowing to keep tax rates from great increases, and by added taxes upon individual and corporate income, the broadening of the individual income tax so that more persons would bear the tax burden; and enactment of an excise or sales tax upon widely used articles not of the first importance.

Mr. Barnes and David Lawrence, publisher of the United States Daily, both analyzed the present economic conditions in their addresses to the trade body.

Stability of government was stressed as of vital importance in the creation of confidence, which was cited as the most important factor influencing a return to normalcy by Mr. Barnes.

With industry's problem no longer production but control, conservation, distribution, and the creation of buying power, anti-trust laws and Government regulation of business must be scrapped, Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the board of the United States Chamber of Commerce, told the Washington Board of Trade at the Willard Hotel last night.

Mr. President, every effort that is made in this country to put the taxes where they ought to be put becomes a national issue with that element undertaking to scrap that kind of ingenuity. We undertook to put a tax on the Oil Trust in the State of Louisiana. We voted a severance tax. That was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. We voted certain other taxes that were upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States when those taxes were placed upon the oil interests. They have never for one moment since ceased to denounce us and to launch a verbal and editorial and news tirade against the deplorable state of affairs that is supposed to exist in the State of Louisiana, meaning nothing under the living sun except that we placed the tax where the tax ought to have been placed and because we undertook at that time to bolster up the antitrust laws and other laws to protect the common and ordinary individual business man in the State of Louisiana.

The fight has reached the Congress. We have eight Representatives from the State of Louisiana and two Senators. My information is that the eight Representatives from the State of Louisiana are opposing the so-called "coalition leadership" of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party that is exerting power in the Congress. I do not know what this "coalition of leadership" is, and I have not seen anybody else that knows what it is. It is supposed to be a coalition of leadership to balance the Budget, supposed to be a coalition of leadership to save the country, supposed to be a coalition of leadership to relieve the country from distress. We do not know what the coalition of leadership is, but if we are to take it from the Washington papers who are giving the news, considering the attitude which is no doubt being taken here in the Capitol by the delegation which comes from the State of Louisiana, they will say, no doubt, as they have already in their editorial columns, not only that the courts are yielding to the pressure of some political dictatorship in the State of Louisiana, but that the Members of Congress are yielding to some political dictatorship in the State of Louisiana.

There is no political dictatorship in the State of Louisiana. There has not been any political dictatorship in the State of Louisiana. Men are left in that State to run according to their merits and their wishes. The opposition that has reared itself up and formed itself at one time into what was known as the Constitutional League, financed by hundreds of thousands of dollars of public and private funds, has gone before the people of that State undertaking to secure representation different from what the people were willing to vote. So now here in the House of Representatives the fight is coming as it has come up in the State of Louisiana.

The newspaper to which I have referred says that the House of Representatives adjourned in disorder on last Saturday. In my opinion, the House of Representatives adjourned in order on last Saturday for the first time in 12 years, when a majority of the House of Representatives gave it out to the country that they were not going to stand for a coalition of leadership in the Congress that was going to allow taxes on various articles to be saddled on the backs of the people of the country. It is about the first time we have heard of any such thing as a supposed-to-be revolutionary movement. One Member on the Democratic side, Mr. Rainey, is quoted as having said that the country is on the very verge of communism. He is quoted as saying that a most chaotic state of affairs exists. Other leaders on the Democratic side and on the Republican side of the House are quoted as saying that their personal and political fortunes mean nothing, and that the Members of the House of Representatives ought to leave it to the will of the people to rebuke them when they go back home, but that they should follow the leadership that is engaged in the lower house of Congress—I do not know how far it has gone in the upper house of Congress—in driving through whatever plan they say for us to sponsor, or whatever they, in their good and careful judgment, think to be necessary to balance the Budget of the country.

The leaders want to know where the money is coming from to balance the Budget. Where is the money coming from to balance the Budget? They say that only a certain amount of money can come from the income tax, and that that is too little. They say only a certain amount of money can come from an inheritance tax, and that is too little. They say that only a certain amount of money can come from all the other sources, and that is too little.

But, Mr. President, with all the great efforts that are exerted here in the Congress for the virtues of the tariff, there has not been one of them yet that has arisen and proposed to protect the oil people of the country from the foreign oil that is being imported into the United States. They do not propose, in their protection of everything that is manufactured on the coast and the inner sections of the country, to have any such thing as a tax placed on the products of the Standard Oil Co. and various other and sundry affiliated oil concerns. They do not dare. "Touch not my anointed and do my prophets no harm." They do not dare talk about raising several billions of dollars by a tax on the Standard Oil Co. I might say that well they might profit by the experience I have had in Louisiana and not advocate putting a tax on the Standard Oil Co., because when I proposed it down there in that State I heard nothing but denunciation by mass meeting after mass meeting, threats of impeachment, and every kind of charge that could be made, and every kind of political persecution and personal persecution that could be applied. Well might the Members of the Congress of the United States profit by the experience we have had in the battle we have had to fight in that State ever since we undertook to put the taxes where they belong.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LONG. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I infer from what the Senator says that he would favor an adequate tariff duty on imported crude oil or petroleum and also an adequate tariff duty on its by-products. Will the Senator permit me to remind him that I have introduced a bill which I earnestly hope will come to early consideration calling for $1 a barrel on crude petroleum and 50 per cent ad valorem on certain of its enumerated by-products? I favor that bill. I think it should be enacted into law and that it should be enforced in the interest of the American laboring man, the American operators, the American people. I trust that I shall have the earnest and, I feel, able support of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the Senator most heartily. Has the coalition passed on that matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not know.

Mr. LONG. I do not know, myself. I agree with the Senator absolutely, 100 per cent.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With or without any "coalition," I believe that the rate I have proposed, namely, $1 a barrel on crude oil and 50 per cent ad valorem on certain byproducts, is sound and meritorious, and, to repeat, I do certainly hope that the bill I have introduced will receive the earliest possible attention, be approved by the Congress, and become law.

Mr. LONG. I agree with what the Senator from California has said. What the Senator proposes is sound.

Mr. President, foreign oil imported into this country has not only been used after being brought into this country as a means of unfair competition with American products and American labor, but it has done more. The oils of Mexico and of Venezuela and of Colombia have been brought into this country to enforce the demands of the Oil Trust in the | United States. They have brought oil in from Venezuela by the shipload and by the tank-car load, placed it upon the border of the Gulf at one time and upon the Pacific coast at another time to increase an already abominable surplus, so that an independent oil operator could not weather the storm and survive. I have known the time when we have sold a 16-gravity oil on the coast and the Gulf for as much as $1.80 a barrel, and at the same time, by the importation of Venezuelan crude, they have forced the people in the State of Louisiana to sell 28-gravity oil for 60 cents a barrel and then declined to take more than one-fifth of the output until they brought the independent oil industry to its knees and forced a sacrifice of the properties it had in this country.

So when there was before us a tax proposed to prevent this injustice that was being inflicted, the message came from President Harding, as it has come from his successor in the distinguished Republican Party, "Nothing must be done that will interfere with the agreed policy of this country to put no tariff on oil." There we have the Wall Street banker; there we have the Non-Partisan League, to which one of the Senators so often refers; there we have the great Non-Partisan League urging that there should be a tariff to protect American industries, but when we came up with a proposal to put a tariff on oil the same invisible government that sent the message down here to put a tariff on everything else sent a reverse message that there was not to be a tariff on oil, and just as abjectly and just as discreetly as the Congress of the United States followed their demands for a tariff on everything else, it followed their demand that there was not to be a tariff that would interfere with the dominion of the Oil Trust in this country.

I do not know what the "coalition" is in the House or what the "coalition" is in the Senate, but let us hear from the coalition when it has investigated this proposition if it is going to undertake to put a tariff on oil to protect the labor and the products of the American people.

Mr. President, going just a little further, we are told that we are faced with communism in America. Certainly we are facing communism in America. Why are we facing communism in America? President Wilson evidently saw this thing coming. Back in 1916 he appointed an Industrial Relations Commission to make a study of economic distress which was then creeping upon the country. I want to read an excerpt from the report of the Industrial Relations Commission:

The ownership of the wealth of the United States has been concentrated to a degree which is difficult to grasp. The recently published researches of a statistician of conservative views have shown that, as nearly as can be estimated, the distribution of wealth in the United States is as follows:

The "rich," 2 per cent of the people, own 60 per cent of the wealth.

The "middle class," 33 per cent of the people, own 35 per cent of the wealth.

The "poor," 65 per cent of the people—

Sixty-five per cent of the peopleown 5 per cent of the wealth.

That was in 1916 when conditions had not become so aggravated. Away back in 1916, 65 per cent of the people of this country, two-thirds of the people, owned less than onetwentieth of the wealth of the country.

Now, we have a report which is somewhat later than the one from which I have quoted. At that time, in 1916, an editorial was published in the Saturday Evening Post. The heading of that editorial was, "How Rich Are We?" The writer of that editorial summed the situation up by saying that along one statistical line this was a country bursting with wealth, but that along another practical and statistical line it was a bloated plutocracy, lording it over the starving hordes, "with a thin margin of merely well-to-do in be-tween." That was the statement of an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post in 1916, I think in the month of October of that year.

I now read as to the condition which was found by the Federal Trade Commission which has been summarized in a little pamphlet entitled "The Country's Plight," by Mr.

Charles G. Ross, the correspondent in Washington of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. In summing up what the Federal Trade Commission found in its report he says:

It found that 1 per cent-

And I quote this, Mr. President, to show how much worse the country's economic situation is growing so far as the distribution of wealth is concerned-

It found that 1 per cent of the decedents owned 59 per cent the estimated wealth.

In other words, in 1916 it was ascertained that 2 per cent of the people owned 60 per cent of the wealth of the country, and a short time ago it was ascertained that 1 per cent of the population of this country owned 59 per cent of the wealth. It is only fair to say from that standpoint, there being a difference of only 1 per cent in the two statistical estimates, the country has become twice as bad off since 1916 in the matter of the concentration of wealth. So in this country economic distress has been gradually intensifying and becoming more aggravated; that process has proceeded ever since 1916 just as fast as a snake ever crawled on the ground

We have seen concentrated wealth force the closing of many banks and have seen it take in every bank that was allowed to remain open, and the others not taken in are closing at a very rapid rate.

Large commercial interests stepped out and took over the stores which they wanted to take over and closed up the others that they did not want to take over, and so since 1916 the whole length and breadth of the United States has been changed into one commercial chain enterprise from one side to the other.

Where is the independent bank in this country that has not been absorbed by the chain bank? Where is the independent grocery store that has not been absorbed by the chain grocery? Where is the independent dry-goods store that has not been absorbed by the chain dry-goods interests in this country? Where are the drug stores that have not been included in the chain? They have been going out of business at a statistical average rate of 435 places of business

In what position now are the 33 per cent of the people of this country who in 1916 owned 35 per cent of the wealth, those whom the Saturday Evening Post described as the "thin margin of merely well-to-do in between," the people of average means, the so-called middle class embracing the grocery man who might make something like five or six or seven thousand dollars a year, who employed a clerk who probably made $2,000 a year, and perhaps an assistant who made as much as $2,500 a year, and then a delivery man or driver who made something like a thousand dollars a year? These little independent businesses operated by middle-class people, the 33 per cent, have been fading out at the rate of 435 a day for a number of years as the concentration of wealth grew like a snowball going down hill, until we have finally reached the point where it may be asked, "Where is the man who made $7,000 last year and could buy a $2,000 automobile? Where is the man who made $2,000 a year and who could buy a $750 automobile?"

Why was it that the automobile factories became paralyzed? Why was it that the garment workers found no employment in making the finer class of fabrics which had been sold on the market? What has come of the department store that used to sell the $100 dress and the $90 dress? They all found that there was such a maldistribution of profits in this country that the point had been reached where there was hardly a man left who could buy an automobile nor an individual left who could afford the kind of fabrics that his family wore in years past.

We talk in Congress now about putting a tax on the people when they are crying for some relief at the hands of the Congress of the United States, when they have been fastening their eyes on Washington and waiting for the knock to come to their doors followed by visitors who would say, "Your Congress and your Government have sent us to you with the relief that you are requiring in order to bring you out of this distress." Instead of that, however, | it is proposed in the other House by the leaders of the coalition movement-and I do not know what is going to be proposed over here, and perhaps there is nobody else who knows-to impose further taxes on the people. There is not going to be any knocking at their doors by visitors bringing glad tidings, but when the knock is heard at the door and the humble citizen rises from the table to meet the visitor for whom he has been waiting for so many years, instead of a visitor bringing the necessary and needed help for the distressful conditions of this country he finds the tax gatherer coming to levy a tax of 21/4 per cent on every-

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A few moments ago the Senator from Louisiana referred to the tax on crude oil, and I think justified such a provision. He also attacked the House for failure to incorporate a provision on the subject while seeking to impose a general sales tax. I know the Senator desires to be accurate in his statement, and I wondered if the Senator's attention had been called to pages 228 and 229 of the bill which is now before the body at the other end of the Capitol, the bill to provide revenue, and so forth, in which on page 228 there is provision for a tax as follows:

(1) Lubricating oils, of the grades designated (at the time of the enactment of this act) by Society of Automotive Engineers viscosity Nos. 20 to 70, inclusive, 4 cents a gallon.

And on page 229 for a tax on crude petroleum, and so forth, as follows:

(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, imported into the United States, 1 cent a gallon.

Mr. LONG. I had understood that the provision for a tax of a cent a gallon on foreign oil was written in the bill not by the coalition but by the insurgent element.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the provision was in the bill as reported to the House.

Mr. LONG. Yes; it was reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was reported by the

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; but it was written in the bill, my understanding is-and if I am wrong, I desire to be corrected-or was proposed by one of the unfortunates outside of the breastworks. I mean it was proposed by members of the committee who were opposed to the sales-tax plan; it was not in the original provision that went to the committee. That is my understanding, but I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was unanimously reported by the committee and it was incorporated in the bill as reported by the committee, and is in the bill now, and I think likely it will be retained.

Mr. LONG. I accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have understood that the committee, as far as it has gone, has provided for a tax of 42 cents a barrel.

Mr. LONG. For 42 cents a barrel, which is far too little to do any good.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is entirely too small.

Mr. LONG. We all know that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have proposed a tax of $1 per barrel, as the Senator knows.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. I understood that a little concession was made in the House in the direction of such a tax.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, who evidently has made a special study of the subject of a tax on oils, what he has to suggest about the tax on lubricating oil.

Mr. LONG. On imports, does the Senator mean? Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. Without question, there ought to be a tax on imported oils. I will say this before departing too far from the subject of oil. The proposal to tax oils has managed to survive up to this time at the rate of 42 cents on a barrel of oil of 42 gallons-I believe that is the number of gallons in a barrel, though the Senator probably knows better than I do. We have been that far several times before though; once before we went that far with the proposal to impose a tax of a dollar a barrel, I believe, but we never got far enough to have it enacted into law. Rules have not yet been brought into effect to restrict the amendments that are coming and going, as I understand, in the other House.

But to get back to the point, Mr. President. I was saying that the leaders of the other House of Congress to-day are warning us that communism is almost on its way. I do not wish to misquote anybody, and I am not responsible if this is not an accurate quotation, but I want to read just what was said by one of the leaders of my own party speaking along with the leader of the Republican Party in the House. He

You are opposed to communism, and so am I, but I want to ay that this Government has gone farther on path toward comsay that this munism in this session of Congress than any other government except that of Russia.

Mr. President, the country has not gone toward communism during this session of Congress, but the country has been going toward communism ever since the wealth of this country began to get into the hands of a few people. It began to go toward communism when the people saw their independent businesses going out of existence; it began to go toward communism when 1 per cent of the people got hold of 59 per cent of the wealth; it began to go toward communism when every independent bank in this country began to go out of existence; it began to go toward communism when every wholesale and retail independent store in this country began to go out of business. It began to go toward communism when, as I said here on the floor of the Senate some few days ago, according to the estimates of the Federal Trade Commission, less than 2,000,000 people-to be exact, one and one-quarter million peoplehad cornered practically every resource and business enterprise, and left no livelihood out of which a man could thrive to-day.

What business could a man have gone into? He could not go into the grocery business and make a living to save his life-not against the chain stores. He could not go into the dry-goods business and make a living to save his lifenot against the chain stores. He could not go into the banking business and last until water got hot. There was not a business on the living face of the earth that a young, growing, enterprising young man, coming from college or from school, could go into, with the enormously paralyzed conditions facing him as they do now, out of which he could ever expect to become a man of respectable standing or of any means at all.

So we have reached a condition in America where somebody has asserted the right to speak. How long the House will remain that way, I do not know; but, Mr. President, in all my lifetime I never slept with the ease and with the composure and with the satisfaction that I did when I learned that the House of Representatives had rebelled against the leadership of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party in undertaking to put this tax upon the backs of the people of this country.

You ask them to go back home to be sacrificed. You say to them that this bill is more necessary than their personal welfare. For whom are they going to be sacrificed? You ask them to go back to the homes of the congressional districts they are supposed to represent in this country when the American people have been waiting and waiting and waiting and waiting for this condition to come about, that a Congress might meet and have an opportunity to render help back there in that country; and they are to be sent back not as men bearing gifts, not as men bearing relief, not as men saying, "Here is the opportunity for the revival of this country," but you propose to send back to the State of Louisiana the Congressmen as taxgatherers off the backs of the people to-day suffering from this economic distress!

There is not any one of the eight men from the State of Louisiana in the lower House of Congress, whom I am informed about, who is going to be sent back there by the Democratic leadership of the House to make a collection of  $2\frac{1}{4}$  per cent; and there is at least one man in the United States Senate who is not going to be sent back there to do that.

"Well, how are you going to balance the Budget?" I am for that, Mr. President, above everybody else; and I want to say here that I do not lay the sole responsibility for this condition at the feet of the Democratic Party or the Republican Party, and I do not by any means lay the responsibility for the economic condition that has prevailed here at the feet of the Republican Party. The Democratic leadership in the United States Senate and in the Congress and in—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not refer to Senators in a disrespectful way.

Mr. LONG. I am not referring to the leadership, Mr. President. There has been no opposition as a party matter—put it that way—either by the national convention of the Democratic Party or the national convention of the Republican Party; there has been no pronouncement as a party matter by the caucus of the House of Representatives nor by the caucus of the United States Senate, either from the Democrats or from the Republicans, proposing to save the masses of the American people from this economic calamity in a way that would provide for the redistribution of the profits of this land and of the wealth of this land.

"How are you going to balance the Budget?" Mr. President, let it be understood that I am not undertaking to take any party advantage of the situation. I am not undertaking to make it a matter of Democratic politics. I am undertaking simply to say that the fault for this condition lies at the feet of everybody in this country. It lies at the feet of us all for failing to step out and meet the enemy without the gates of the city before the distress came here.

We had plenty of warning before the time this condition came on. We know that the wealthy interests of this country will not consent to anything that is going to impair their fortunes—not to a thing on earth. They are not going to consent to anything that takes the income through which they have piled their concentrated fortunes high. All the more they are not going to consent to or tolerate anything that might for a moment chisel into these concentrated piles that have brought about the paralysis of this country.

We have a little line of authority on that. I am going to take the terrible liberty, if the Chair will permit, of reading a few lines from Josephus' Antiquities of the Jews. He said this, page 207:

By these examples anyone may learn how many and how great instances of wickedness men will venture upon for the sake of getting money and authority, and that they may not fail of either of them; for as when they are desirous of obtaining the same, they acquire them by 10,000 evil practices; so when they are afraid of losing them, they get them confirmed to them by practices much worse than the former, as if (no) other calamity so terrible could befall them as the failure of acquiring so exalted an authority; and when they have acquired it, and by long custom found the sweetness of it, the losing it again; and since this last would be the heaviest of all afflictions, they all of them contrive and venture upon the most difficult actions out of the fear of losing the same.

And so, as it was written 2,000 years ago, it applies to-day that all of them have contrived upon "the most difficult actions" for fear that they might lose some of the fortune that they have accumulated. Yes; they have contrived the most difficult of actions. When you go back to the toiling and suffering and distressed people of this country to-day who can not pay their taxes, who can not buy shoes for their children here in this land of plenty, this land of wool and cotton piled so high that you can not see the sun for it, but with nobody that has any money to buy it, and foodstuffs that are rotting on the shore and in the inland country and people starving for them and nobody with money enough to buy them—when you go back and contrive and scheme to-day to put taxes upon those people, who can not bear what they now have, you are venturing upon the most unspeakable tyranny that has ever been looked upon by the common man in the streets and by the man at the forks of the creek.

If you love this country and want it preserved as I want it preserved here, you will not go back to the people of America to-day telling them that in this time of economic crisis and with the concentration of wealth as it is, you are going to undertake to solve the troubles of the public Treasury by leveling an additional burden upon them at this time; not if you want, as Mr. Rainey so ably says, to keep communism from the door of the American people.

Now, Mr. Barnes comes out—but before going into that, how are we going to balance the Budget if we can not balance it with a tax on inheritances? By a tax on inheritances, Mr. President, I mean a tax applying to these cases where a man dies leaving a billion dollars or $2,000,000,000 and transfers that entire $2,000,000,000 to somebody and like a snowball to roll downhill for 25 more years, and then that son dies with probably double that amount of money, and that snowball rolls until it goes downhill. They tell you that these fortunes break up every three or four generations. Some of them do, but there are fewer and fewer fortunes at the end of every 10 years and there is always a smaller per cent owning a greater per cent of the wealth at the end of every decade under this constantly growing system.

Hence, if you can not raise the money from the incomes in the higher brackets, if you can not raise the money from the inheritances—and I think you can raise a great deal there—and from the tax that ought to be put on oil, then what ought to be done?

Let us say that the leadership is correct. Let us say that when we have exhausted those fields we will not have sufficient revenue to meet the deficit now prevailing in the Treasury of the United States. Then, what are we going to do?

Why, Mr. President, I saw the time during the war with Germany, when I was undertaking to defend a man charged with crime, that I was afraid to read Washington's Farewell Address to the jury for fear of being jailed for contempt! We have seen times when the very sacred documents of this country could hardly be quoted by a man who was being tried for his life or his liberty. And, gentlemen of the Senate, and Mr. President, if I might be pardoned, if I might not shock the sensibilities of the great lawmakers of this country, if I might not be revolutionary in undertaking to avoid communism, if we can not raise the funds from the inheritance taxes, if we can not raise the funds from income taxes. if we can not raise the funds from the oil taxes, I wonder if it would be possible for me to say that the Lord propounded the law and pointed out the way. I wonder if it would shock the understanding and the customs of the Senate if we were to turn back to the law that was laid down for man when this earth was created or a short time after it was

How would we raise the money? If we could not raise it from incomes, if we could not raise it from inheritances, if we could not raise it from the gambling that occurs in the stock exchanges of this country, then there is a way pointed out in the Bible. Take it from the profit. Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Baker, Mr. Morgan would sleep considerably more soundly to-night with $100,000,000 under their pillowcases than they are going to sleep during the next 10 years with a billion or two billion dollars under their pillowcases.

I would not take away from them one single luxury that their human appetites could demand or consume. I would not deprive them of the palaces in Spain, in Switzerland, in England, nor the fish ponds for the sports, nor the various and sundry estates for the chase of the hounds, nor anything that is needed to appease the most refined and developed appetite. I would not take away one of the 100 limousines from them; but I would simply say, "When you reach the point in this country where you have so many billions and billions and billions, and another nine hundred millions on top of it is not going to do you any more good than what you have now, we are not going to allow the water to be siphoned out of the spring and have more people left in a little pool, twenty times as many people left in a little pool, as you have; we are not going to let your useless gluttony stagnate this country."

If it will not offend the sensibilities or the standards or the customs of a lawmaking body, I am going to read about three or four lines clipped out of Scripture at random:

Moreover the profit of the earth is for all: The King himself is served by the field.

Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers?

Who was it that gave America for a spoil, and turned Chicago over to the Capones?

Did not the Lord, He against whom we have sinned? For they would not walk in His ways, neither were they obedient unto His law.

What were the laws? These were the laws, that every 50 years there would be a jubilee throughout the land, and that wealth would be redistributed in such a way as to keep the common horde of people consuming and enjoying the fruits of the land. That was the first command of the Creator.

The second command of the Creator was that these laws which were prescribed for the Jews were prescribed for all races, and that if the human race would not heed the warning, that the wealth must not be allowed to accumulate in a few hands, there was no country on the earth which could survive with such a failure to heed the warning.

So the Lord spoke further. "If you distribute this wealth, then," the Scripture says, "you will lie down at night in a land of safety and peace, and dwell in a land of comfort and plenty for all. But if you will not do it, there is no country that is going to survive with the accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few people."

Divine law does not seem to mean much in this day and time; it does not mean very much, but there has never been a country which arose on the face of the living earth that has ever been able to stay on the face of the earth if it did not keep the wealth of the country distributed in the hands of the people of the country.

It does not mean much; it is rather resented when one undertakes to go back and quote from the very common causes which have meant the fall of every empire and nation that has ever arisen, but there has never been a country that has ever been able to survive when departing from that law.

Here in the Congress of the United States we have an opportunity. There is a House of Representatives which appears to be willing to declare that we will not put on the backs of the people of this country one single additional burden, that we will not enact one law which will aggravate this condition of the concentration of wealth. We have the opportunity, through the methods which have been proposed, and through a national policy, to accomplish the deconcentration of wealth in the United States.

I know what that means. That is a terrible task to follow. It is a hard road to travel. We all realize the control and the influence of certain commercial interests in the political affairs in this country; and I am the last above all men ever to invite a man to commit suicide, politically speaking. But to-day the opportunity is here. There are the great masters of finance and fortune, with all the power that Samson ever had, with the left arm around one pillar of the temple and the right arm around the other. They have all the goods, all the food to eat, all the clothes to wear, factories which are idle because there is nobody to buy the products to be made because the people have no money with which to purchase them. Here we have the great, towering, masterly Minotaurs of finance and of fortune-I almost said of government—and here they have the opportunity not only of saving the greatest country we know of but of saving themselves.

This country and this Congress should have mercy, not only upon the people generally but mercy upon the masters of finance and fortune, who unless they are restrained from pulling the pillars from underneath the temple, are going to pull the temple down upon themselves, along with the remainder of the people. Unless they are restrained to-day, unless we, in the midst of this economic paralysis, unless this Congress set about these things which will result in the wealth of this country drifting back into the hands of the masses to some reasonable extent, and unless we undertake to make up the deficit, and make the Government discharge the lawful and ordinary purposes that government is supposed to serve, placing the burdens in such a manner that there will be a more nearly equal distribution of wealth, then we are not going to be of any service to this country.

I would not for a moment have it thought that I was stepping out of spirit with the times in what I am saying. I can quote the President of the United States to this effect. I am not out of line with President Hoover. He may not say it any more, but at least he has said something about it. I refer to a speech President Hoover delivered in Indianapolis, and in the same speech the President said, in opposing a large bond issue for new public works:

The remedy for economic depression is not waste but the creation and distribution of wealth.

That was the stand of Mr. Hoover in a speech he delivered in Indianapolis, that the practical relief for the people during this economic situation was in the distribution of the wealth of the United States.

The Hon. Oscar W. Underwood, who served as leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate and in the House of Representatives for a number of years, near the end of his public career, or perhaps after he had retired from public life, published his memoirs. He finally made the statement, although his record in the two Houses of Congress may not appear to everybody, as it does not to me, to have been consistent with this statement, that it was his opinion as the result of his numbers of years of experience in public life that the conditions which prevailed and the fault with this country were due to the distribution of its wealth in the hands of a few people.

That was the doctrine of the Scriptures. That was the doctrine of every law writer we have ever known. I do not understand that that doctrine is opposed by any conservative leadership that we find in either of the Houses of Congress. I do not hear it being opposed. But Mr. RAINEY, in his speech the other day, said that if we really are intent on a proposition of reducing the fortunes of this country, not to hide behind a screen to do it but to come out into the open and say that we have a motive to try to distribute the wealth of this country more nearly among the people as a whole.

I think it should be not only our paramount, our primary object, but our main purpose, to raise money to support the Government, to provide for this deficit, aye, more, to provide for the various other things which need the help of the Government; but if there is a coalition in the Senate or in the other House, I think it ought to be up to the Congress of the United States, the Senate and the House, to go on record, when we are trying to solve the distress of the Government Treasury, that we are going to prescribe a cure that is going to be for 120,000,000 people.

Let us have it understood that it is our object and that it is our purpose to bring the fruits of this land, the wealth of this land, to be enjoyed by 120,000,000 people; that there will be no surplus of food with people starving; that there will be no overproduction of clothing with people naked; that there will be no empty houses with people sleeping on park benches and walking the roads; that there will be no idleness of factories because people have not the money with which to buy the products those factories make—but that we will distribute the wealth, the products, the fruit, the fortunes of this land not only to support this Government but to provide an economic welfare and a chance to

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rules of the Senate, there must be no demonstrations in the galleries.

AMENDMENT OF WORLD WAR VETERANS' ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate, in the form of a resolution coming over from a previous day, the motion of Mr. Norris to discharge the Committee on Finance from the consideration of the bill (S. 929) relating to the taking of depositions in cases arising under section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this is a motion to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of Senate bill 929. If the motion is agreed to, the effect will be to place the bill on the calendar.

Mr. President, this bill was introduced in the Senate on December 9, 1931. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee on the 1st day of February. On February 2 it was reported from the Judiciary Committee by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Robinson] and placed on the calendar. On February 5, upon a call of the calendar, when the bill was reached the amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to, and the bill was about to pass, there being up to that time nowhere, either in the subcommittee or the full Committee on the Judiciary or in the Senate, any objection whatsoever to it.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] then called attention to the fact that the bill was an amendment of the World War veterans' act and that since that act had been reported by the Finance Committee the bill ought to have gone to the Finance Committee. I thought and said at the time that the bill had been properly referred to the Judiciary Committee. It refers to litigation and lawsuits pending in the district courts of the United States. It has relation to the taking of depositions where a World War veteran has pending an action against the United States in some district court of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The Legislative Clerk. A bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may continue the consideration of my motion and dispose of it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Nebraska desires to speak further, I wish to make a brief

Mr. NORRIS. Unless the Senator is willing that my motion shall prevail, I wish to proceed. If he is so willing, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield if the Senator does not want to make a speech. If we have to debate it, I want to conclude what I have to say before I yield to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator I have no desire to debate it at all. I merely wish to make a statement and then I have to attend a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. It is true that the bill was referred to the Finance Committee. We referred it to the Veterans' Bureau, as we do all similar legislation affecting veterans of the World War. Administrator Frank L. Hines addressed a letter to myself as chairman of the Finance Committee, live and a chance to grow to the people of the United States. dated February 11, 1932, a copy of which I ask now to have printed in the RECORD.

> The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The letter is as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION, Washington, February 11, 1932.

Hon. REED SMOOT,

Chairman Committee on Finance,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: This is in response to your request for a report from this administration concerning S. 929, "A bill relating to the taking of depositions in cases arising under section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended." The proposed amendment is as follows:

proposed amendment is as follows:

"In any suit, action, or proceeding brought under the provisions of this section no deposition shall be taken at a greater distance from the place of trial than 100 miles without permission of the court being first had upon proper application and cause shown. No such permission shall be granted unless (1) the application is accompanied by an affidavit setting forth the fact intended to be established by such deposition, and (2) reasonable opportunity has been afforded the opposite party to be present at the hearing upon such application. Where the claimant is suing as a poor person pursuant to the act entitled 'An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court,' approved July 20, 1892, as amended, no such permission shall be granted upon application by the United States unless there is deposited with the clerk of the trial court the sum of $25, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be available to the claimant for obtaining representation at shall be available to the claimant for obtaining representation at the taking of such deposition. Any part of such sum not required therefor shall be returned to the United States. Reasonable notice of the name of the witness and the time and place of the taking of the deposition shall be given in writing to the

That part of the proposed bill that requires an affidavit setting forth the fact intended to be established by such deposition is objectionable because it compels the Government to disclose in advance of the trial a part of its defense. In other words, it amounts to fishing.

That part of the proposed bill which requires that reasonable opportunity has been afforded the opposite party to be present at the hearing of the application seems unnecessary since it is not thought that any court would grant such application on an ex thought that any court would grant such application on an exparte hearing.

Section 500 of the World War veterans' act, as amended, provides that the court may allow the attorney for the successful party to a suit on a war-risk insurance contract a fee not exceeding 10 per cent of the amount recovered. Furthermore, it has been held that in addition to the fee provided for in section 500, the attorney for the successful party may have his necessary expenses.

The proposed bill provides that in addition to the foregoing the Government shall pay an attorney's fee of $25 for each deposition taken. Under the practice of the administration to take the depositions of its doctors rather than for them to appear in court personally many depositions will be taken in each case, and, therefore, to compel the Government to pay a fee of $25 in each case would result in large expenditure being made by the Government. Also the proposed amendment would add to the amount to be received by the attorneys for a plaintiff. On the basis of to be received by the attorneys for a plaintiff. On the basis of our present load it is estimated some 50,000 depositions will be taken on behalf of the United States, so the expenditure required by the bill would total approximately $2,500,000. The bill does not set forth the department of the Government which will be called upon to advance the money, but presumably it would be the Department of Justice.

It is, of course, to be assumed that no attorney will file a suit on a contract of war-risk insurance unless he thinks he can secure judgment. Most courts allow an attorney 10 per cent of the full amount of the contract, which results in the attorney receiving the sum of $1,380 in each case in which he is successful. This seems to this administration to be a very liberal fee, and that out of such fee the plaintiff's attorney should be required, if necessary, to pay an attorney for representing his client at the taking of the depositions. This seems especially so since in the general practice of law where an attorney takes a case on a contingent fee he can easily secure attorneys to represent his client at the taking of depositions who will do so for a contingent fee.

The bill is probably objectionable since it seeks to amend an act approved July 20, 1892, which is a general act, by an amendment to a section of a strictly separate act, which is in the nature of a special act.

In view of the foregoing reasons this administration is not in favor of the proposed legislation.

A copy of this letter is inclosed for your use.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Administrator.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, and allow the bill to be placed upon the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I shall have nothing further to say.

Mr. KING. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask my colleague whether the bill was considered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], or by the full com-

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to my colleague that it has not been considered by the committee, nor was it assigned to any of the five subcommittees of that committee to consider. At that time, of course, we had not received an answer from General Hines, but it is an adverse report which we finally did receive, and I am having it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator another question. In view of the fact that the bill was referred to General Hines and a report has recently been submitted by him and the committee have not had an opportunity to take up the matter, though they have taken up many other bills and passed upon substantially all of them, I was wondering whether the Senator considered it necessary to discharge the Finance Committee? Personally, I have no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. I was proceeding to give those reasons, and I can give them; but if there is no objection to my motion prevailing I do not want to take the time of the Senate to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The bill was originally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Did the Committee on the Judiciary consider the bill on its merits?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Mr. McNARY. The Then it was referred to the Finance Committee and I understand an unfavorable report was made by General Hines to the Finance Committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Mr. McNARY. Is it the purpose now to place the bill on the calendar?

Mr. NORRIS. If my motion prevails the bill will automatically be placed upon the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. As it has been committed to the Finance Committee, why does it not report the bill and have it placed on the calendar?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the purpose of my motion. Of course, I have not gone into the matter, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], representing the Finance Committee, has no objection to the bill being placed on the calendar, and therefore I do not care to discuss it unless somebody desires further debate on it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The bill deserves consideration by a committee before it is reported. It deserves consideration by the committee which has been handling veterans' relief matters. These are days of economy. I am sure the Senate would be surprised to know that the effect of the bill would be to add about two and one-half million dollars to the fees paid by the Government to lawyers of the veterans who bring suits on insurance policies. These lawyers at present are getting something like $1,300 per case, a very liberal fee, and it is coming out of the United States Treasury. The bill adds $25 to that sum. It means a total of about two and one-half million dollars, according to General Hines, added to the amount to be paid to the lawyers. Why should not the Finance Committee have a chance to consider the proposal and to consider how much these lawyers are getting now? We can not act as a Committee of the Whole and pass on details like that.

I do not know why the Senator from Nebraska should be so impatient to discharge the committee. The Finance Committee has been working very earnestly ever since the beginning of the session.

Mr. SMOOT. We have reported nearly 75 bills.

Mr. REED. It is not that we have been idle all this time. I think the Senate, in consideration of the onus of the work before that committee, ought to give us a little more time. There is no disposition on our part to smother the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to having the bill placed upon the calendar. Even if the Finance Committee should consider the bill and report it adversely, as no doubt it would, based on the report of General Hines, it would go to the calendar, so we might as well let it go there now.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it will, unless we let the committee put it to sleep in a pigeonhole, where it would stay permanently.

Mr. President, I can see from what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said it is necessary for me to explain the present parliamentary situation, which I now proceed to do, and ask the consideration of the Senate. If I am not able to show a fair, honest procedure by the Judiciary Committee in this case, and if promises made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania are not shown to have been disregarded, then let the Senate vote down my motion and let the bill sleep the eternal sleep of death in the pigeonholes of the Finance Committee.

There is no reason why the bill originally should not have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary. I appeal to every lawyer that it was properly referred in the first place. When it was called on the calendar I only consented to having it referred to the Finance Committee on the promise of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] that if I would let it go to that committee, all they cared was to have a record of it going there and that they would report it back promptly. I will show what the record was, and I will read what they said on the floor of the Senate when I made that agreement.

This is a bill providing that in the particular litigation referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, in a case by a World War veteran on his insurance policy, begun under the law and to be tried in a district court of the United States, that where the Government undertakes to take a deposition, if notice provides for the taking of the deposition at a point more than 100 miles distant from the place of holding court, before they can take such deposition they must make a showing to the court that it is necessary, and if the court finds that it is necessary for them to take such a deposition at that distance, then it will require the Government to pay not to exceed $25 to some lawyer at the place of taking the deposition, to appear and represent the

As I stated, the bill is here on a recommendation of the World War veterans and their attorneys who have had experience in trying these kinds of cases. I called attention to one case as an illustration, which was pending before one of the district courts of the United States when the Government served notice upon the attorney for the veterans to take depositions. It was in my own State of Nebraska. The notice was to take the deposition of a witness in Richmond, Va., and another in St. Louis, Mo., and still another in Chicago, Ill. I no doubt have the cities wrong, though I am sure Richmond, Va., was one of them. What did that mean? It meant that the veteran was absolutely blocked. He could not go around to take those depositions. He was poor, as most of them are who are suing in similar cases. It was an impossibility for him to attend or to employ an attorney to attend the taking of those depositions.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. All the bill does is to provide that if depositions are to be taken more than 100 miles away from where the court sits, the Government must furnish enough money for the veteran to hire a lawyer at the place of taking the deposition to represent the veteran in the suit.

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. On Saturday last I received a letter from a veteran in Birmingham, Ala., stating that he has a claim pending in the court there. He had been notified that the Government would take the evidence of three doctors in Washington next week. He was asking me to represent him in cross-examining the witnesses, because he said he was not able to employ a lawyer in Washington to represent him. Of course, I could not represent him as a lawyer in a case against the Government. I have written him that we have this bill pending, which I had supposed would not have serious opposition. But in the meantime he is endeavoring to get representatives of the American Legion here to appear as his representatives to cross-examine the doctors in Washington when the depositions are taken.

Mr. NORRIS. There is another illustration. The man in Nebraska who gave me this information is a professor in the State university, a very able lawyer. He represents veterans in these cases without a fee. He has had a great deal of experience. He told me it was a common thing. He said in some cases he had paid expenses of other attorneys and had himself gone at his own expense, because he was impressed with the justice of his client's case, because the soldier had no money and the great Government of the United States was endeavoring to drag him all over the country where he could not go. Places within 100 miles of the place of holding court are not covered by the bill.

Is there anything wrong about the bill? Does it not appeal to all fair-minded men? I introduced it. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and as chairman of that committee I referred it to a subcommittee. The subcommittee had it for a couple of weeks. I gave the subcommittee a large amount of correspondence which they looked over and examined. I told the chairman of the subcommittee if they wanted further evidence, I would wire to this man who had given a great deal of attention to the matter in Lincoln, Nebr., one of the professors in the State university of that State.

After they had examined what they had, the chairman of the subcommittee said, "We do not need any more evidence; it is so fair, as it appears to us, there can be no objection to the bill." The subcommittee reported the bill to the full Judiciary Committee and that committee took it up and considered it. They approved the report of the subcommittee, and unanimously recommended to the Senate the passage of the bill. The Senator from Indiana was designated by me, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to make the report, and he did it. The bill was on the calendar; nobody ever dreamed that there would be any objection to it. No suggestion up to that time had ever come to me that the bill ought originally to have been referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator from Nebraska ask for the opinion of the Veterans' Bureau on the bill before his committee reported it?

Mr. NORRIS. No; and that reminds me to say that there are some things about which I do not need to ask the Veterans' Bureau. I know what it means for a poor man in litigation to have notice served on him to take the deposition of a witness 2,000 miles away. I do not need any advice from the Veterans' Bureau on a subject of that kind. Furthermore, every one of the members of the Judiciary Committee knows more about trying lawsuits than the head of the Veterans' Bureau knows; and I mean no disrespect to him whatever.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. As I understand, the suits in question are brought against the Veterans' Bureau, and one would hardly expect the Veterans' Bureau to be advising legislation that would make their difficulties greater.

Mr. NORRIS. It is the Veterans' Bureau's condition we are trying to remedy by this legislation.

Mr. DILL. And in the light of the record here, in case after case, to the number of hundreds, if it had not been for the lawyers who risked their money, very many of the exservice men would not have a dollar to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. They would not have a dollar.

Mr. DILL. It seems to me that the opinion of the Veterans' Bureau is not worth very much in this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is it not possible that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate ought to know something about the trial of an ordinary lawsuit? If not, the Senate ought to dismiss that committee; there should not be a Judiciary Committee. The 18 Senators who are members of that committee know something about taking depositions; they know what it means to have the other side serve notice on a client who has not a dollar to take a deposition in San Francisco and the same day to take another deposition in New York. It means the absolute denial of justice, Mr. President, and nothing else. Those are the things which are going on; that is what we want to remedy.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says it will take millions of dollars out of the Treasury. It will not take 1 cent out of the Treasury unless those who represent the United States make the move that will take it out.

The bill, as I have said, on the call of the calendar came up. Then the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania stated in substance—and if anybody questions it I will read word for word what they said; they said a good deal, and I also said some things when the bill came upthat the Committee on Finance was the committee to which was referred the veterans act, and all amendments to that act, therefore, ought to be referred to that committee. I think there is some reason and some justice in that contention. They further said, however, that there was no objection to the bill, but they wanted it referred to the Finance Committee so that the record would be complete. Under those circumstances I consented to have the bill referred to that committee.

Let me read to the Senate just a few of the statements that were made when action referring the bill to the Finance Committee was taken. That was done on February 5, 1932. To-day is the 21st day of March. Almost two months have elapsed—remember that—and yet, as the Senator from Utah has said, the bill has not even been referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance. With that in mind, listen to what was said on that occasion. I stated, as I have said here, that the bill involved a question of law and it seemed to me it ought to have gone to the Judiciary Committee. It is a question of legal practice.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed], among other things, said:

Mr. President, the Senator will not have to convince me. On reading the bill, it seems to me to be all right and I have no objection whatever to it. But I think it is highly important that objection whatever to it. But I think it is highly important that the same committee should consistently act on amendments to the veterans' act. The bill might also go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and we are glad to have their help; but think how ridiculous it would be if, not knowing what the Judiciary Committee were doing to the section affected by the bill, we in the Finance Committee were to report out another bill amending the section to read so and so section to read so and so.

So Senators will see there was no objection to the measure, as the Senator from Pennsylvania said, in so many

On reading the bill, it seems to me to be all right and I have no objection whatever to it.

But it was desired to have the bill go to the Finance Committee in order that the records of the Finance Committee might show that the measure had been referred to that committee and had been reported to the Senate. Later on the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed] said:

The chairman of the Finance Committee is here, and I think he expects to have a meeting of the committee very soon, and

I should think this bill could be back on the calendar and passed before this time next week. I will do my best to speed action on it.

"This time next week." That was February 5; this is the 21st day of March, and the bill still slumbers in the Finance Committee. I can read all this debate if Senators desire me to do so; it is all interesting; but I am only going to read an occasional excerpt. I then said:

Mr. President, in the present parliamentary status of the bill, its consideration being subject to objection, I have to comply with the request. I am doing so, however, on the express assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that within a reasonable time the bill will be reported back to the Senate so that we can have action on it.

Then the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], the chairman of the Finance Committee, who had previously given assurance that this would happen, said:

I assure the Senator that it will be reported next week, perhaps Tuesday or Wednesday.

That was just a few days. February 5 was on Friday; and the Senator from Utah was going to have the bill reported the next Tuesday or Wednesday; but still nothing has been done.

Mr. President, it is not my contention that the Committee on Finance has been derelict; I am making no complaint. That committee is overworked, as are most of the other committees; but we were given to understand that these Senators favored the bill, though they desired to make their records complete, and it was understood that the reference of the bill to the Committee on Finance was merely a matter of form. Now, however, we are confronted with opposition. I have waited now for six weeks for the Finance Committee to report this bill. They could have reported it unfavorably if they had wanted to do so, but no action has been taken.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Finance Committee, if they can not consider a bill within the time during which this bill has been before them, ought to be willing to report it back to the Senate, especially when it is a bill which has had the consideration and the unanimous recommendation of a committee that, after all, is the proper committee to consider this kind of legislation. Therefore I ask Senators to yote for this motion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when this matter came up last in the Senate, on the 5th of February, I did as all other Senators did, I presume—I glanced at it very hastily—and, as it seemed to be all right, I said that there did not seem to be any objection to it. However, whether the Senator from Nebraska agrees or not, we think it is wise to send bills to the departments which are affected by them, in order to obtain their opinion. The report of the Veterans' Administrator was so strong in opposition to this bill that it put a new light on it.

I make no apology for changing the impression which I had formed on a hasty glance at the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede very frankly that the Senator has a right to change his mind, and I am not finding fault with him for that; but I should like to ask if, under the record as shown here and which I have read, the Senator does not believe that the committee ought to have acted before this, even though they wanted to make an adverse report?

Mr. REED. I grant that, and if the Senator had brought it to my attention I would have been the first to ask that the committee have a meeting and act on the bill, just as I now expect to ask the Senator from Utah to have a meeting to act on the bill.

However, Mr. President, if we are going to pass this kind of legislation without proper committee study of its effects, there is no telling where the end will be. It is not a bill for the relief of the veterans; it is a bill for the relief of the lawyers of the veterans who are already being very generously treated by the Government paying their fees. This is not going to help the veterans any, but the lawyers of the veterans are getting $1,380 per case out of these lawsuits. They could very easily pay the expense involved in calling in an associate in a distant town where a deposition is to be taken; but it is because the lawyers are too stingy to give up one penny of the stated fee which they accept from the Government that we are now asked to make the Government pay two million and a half dollars more for the benefit of those lawyers to relieve them of the responsibility which is theirs of protecting their clients and taking the depositions.

Under all the circumstances, Mr. President, I feel it is my duty to call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. The motion will go to the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the proceeding is by unanimous consent. I asked unanimous consent, which was granted, to dispose of this motion, even if the hour of 2 o'clock had passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given only to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. No; before that was requested I asked unanimous consent to take up the motion and dispose of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair put the other request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the motion ought to be disposed of, as a matter of fact, if it does not violate the rules completely, because the Senate Committee on the Judiciary once decided this matter and decided it definitely, and there is no occasion for another committee to hold it up for months and months, when unquestionably the relief ought to be granted.

Mr. NORRIS. It is in order at least to make a motion to take this question up, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. I make that motion now. If we have got to go through with it a half a dozen times, we might just as well commence now. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of the bill S. 929.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to be heard on that; it is a debatable question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst Dale Robinson, Ind. Jones Austin Bailey Davis Dickinson Kean Kendrick Schall Sheppard Bankhead Dill Keves Shipstead King Barbour Shortridge Smith Fletcher Logan Barkley Long McGill McKellar Bingham Frazier Smoot Steiwer George Thomas, Idaho Thomas, Okla. Blaine Glass Glenn McNary Metcalf Goldsborough Townsend Bratton Broussard Gore Morrison Trammell Mos Tydings Vandenberg Hale Harrison Neely Bulow Wagner Hastings Norbeck Hatfield Norris Capper Caraway Carey Coolidge Walsh, Mass. Hawes Nye Hayden Oddie Waterman Watson Patterson Hebert Wheeler Howell Pittman Copeland White Costigan Hull Couzens Johnson Robinson, Ark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to see the bill go over in favor of the regular order. I have called a meeting of the Committee on Finance for Thursday morning. That is the first time I can have the meeting.

I am going to ask the Senator to allow the committee to make a report on the bill not later than Thursday, and we will settle this whole question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will propose a unanimousconsent agreement; and if it is agreed to, that will settle it. Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I desire to make just one brief observation.

This is simply another instance of the fact that bills and resolutions vitally affecting the service men of the country, and particularly the disabled service men of the country, go into the Committee on Finance and are never heard from afterwards. That is the very thing that led the American Legion, in its national convention last year, to insist that a committee be organized in the United States Senate to handle veterans' legislation and to handle that alone, for the very reason that when such legislation goes before the Finance Committee of the Senate, for some cause or other that is the last that is ever heard of it.

I am not accusing anybody connected with the committee of any conduct that is in the slightest degree or in any sense of the word unbecoming. The work of that committee is tremendous. The committee certainly has enough to do to keep it busy all the time without wrestling with this character of legislation, which frequently and usually involves the expenditure of millions, and sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars. So there ought to be a special committee for that purpose.

Here is this bill, introduced by the senior Senator from Nebraska. It went to the Committee on the Judiciary. The chairman of that committee, who is the senior Senator from Nebraska, appointed a subcommittee, of which I think I had the honor to be the chairman—a subcommittee of three Members of this body and of the committee. The subcommittee unanimously reported the bill back to the entire committee with the recommendation that the bill pass. Then the Judiciary Committee unanimously ordered it reported to the Senate. I had not known until to-day that the Senator from Nebraska had agreed to a unanimous-consent proposal to have the bill then recommitted to the Committee on Finance. There, it seems, it has been until this moment.

While I do not impugn in the slightest degree the motives of members of the Finance Committee, I do say that the press of business in that committee is such that these matters that are vital to hundreds of thousands of service men in the country are lost sight of and never see the light of day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Indiana, if the Senator from Nebraska will

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. Not just at the present time. I started to say something, and I want to finish it.

After saying that I was going to comply with the request that was made on February 5, when this bill was reached on the calender, I used this language: I have read it before to-day, but it may be that some Senators have come in since:

In the present parliamentary status of the bill, its consideration being subject to objection, I have to comply with the request.

That was the request to let it go to the Finance Committee, and they had promised that if I let it go there they would bring it right back. Further, I said this:

I am doing so, however, on the express assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that within a reasonable time the bill will be reported back to the Senate so that we can have action on it.

Then the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] said:

I assure the Senator that it will be reported next week, perhaps Tuesday or Wednesday.

This occurred on Friday, February 5; and, as I have said before, the bill is still unreported, although the committee had a report, which the Senator has put in the Record, from General Hines, the Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau, dated February 11, 1932. So they were doing something there. They wrote to the bureau. They got an answer on the 11th day of February. No action was taken, although this is the 21st day of March.

As between gentlemen, as between Senators as well as gentlemen, do you not think that with that agreement that we had when this bill went to the Finance Committee it ought to be back here now, when they agreed to bring it back within a few days—probably the following Tuesday or Wednesday—and that was on Friday?

Six weeks have passed, and before this roll call was asked for to get a quorum I read what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed] had said. He said, in so many words, that he had read the bill; that he had no objection whatever to it; that he wanted it to go to the Finance Committee so that their records would be complete, because they had been handling that kind of legislation. Under those circumstances, under that agreement, the bill went to that committee.

I ask any man who wants to be fair whether the time that has elapsed is not sufficient to justify me in making this motion to discharge the committee. Notwithstanding that, I am willing even to go beyond that; and I say now to the Senator from Utah that if he will agree to a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill shall be reported by the Finance Committee on or before Thursday next, and, if not so reported, it shall be placed upon the calendar, we will let it go. Will the Senator agree to that?

Mr. SMOOT. I have already stated that I would do that, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Chair, then, to put the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimouse-consent agreement suggested by the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator withdraws his motion?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not withdraw it. We had an agreement once before. Just let the motion be undisposed of. I have not agreed to withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator withdraws his request to proceed to the consideration of the motion?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I withdraw that; but the motion itself to discharge the committee still lies on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana no doubt can do a great deal more work than can the Senator from Utah or the other members of the Committee on Finance, and perhaps he thinks we have not done anything at this session of Congress. But we have reported out of that committee over 70 bills at this session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I am talking about veterans' legislation, and that alone.

Mr. SMOOT. Over 60 veterans' bills have been reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Even so, I still say that there ought to be a veterans' committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not going to refer to that. The Senate can do whatever it desires to do about that. If the Senate wants such a committee, it can create it. But so long as such legislation comes before the Committee on Finance, and so long as that is the proper place for such bills, we are going to do the very best we can with the measures which come before the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that perhaps I am to blame for the whole situation to which he has referred. I want also to call his attention to the fact that not a single day passes when we have not worked in some committee, upon some important legislation, ever ! since this session began.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska. Mr. NORRIS. I do not dispute the Senator at all; in fact, I am prepared to admit that the Senator is one of the hardest-worked men in the Senate; but the Senator knew that when he made the agreement to report on the next Tuesday or Wednesday the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; and that is what I thought we could do. I thought at that time that that could be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Not being able to do that, why does the Senator object now to letting the bill go to the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must remember that when the Senator brought up the matter in the first place I said that as far as I was concerned I had no objection to the bill going on the calendar.

I shall try to get the Finance Committee together, although it is the hardest thing in the world to get a quorum of the committee, because all the committees of the Senate are now worked almost to death. I would like to see the time, and I believe it will come, when there will not be so many as 20 Senators upon one committee. The number is too large, and it results in Senators being on too many committees. It seems impossible for Senators to attend all committee meetings and get out legislation from the committees.

LOANS TO VETERANS ON CERTIFICATES

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance a question.

Several weeks ago I called the Senator's attention to Senate bill 272, which was introduced December 9, last, and is No. 7 on the calendar of the Finance Committee. It is a very brief bill.

I would like to ask the Senator whether the Finance Committee could not take up that bill Thursday when they meet. I do not care to make a motion to discharge the committee, of course, if I can obtain action.

Mr. SMOOT. That bill relates to loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates?

Mr. BLACK. It relates to the case of a soldier who did not secure his adjusted-service certificate at the time the law was passed, and under the law, as it is, if a soldier gets his certificate now, he can not obtain a loan until the expiration of two years. It has worked a very unfair discrimination against those veterans who waited, from patriotic motives, because they believed they did not need the money and could get along without it. This measure would amend the law so as to authorize a loan to be made upon a certificate immediately upon its issuance.

There can be no earthly reason that I can imagine why a soldier who served in the same war with the other soldiers should not obtain his loan as quickly as some one who happened to have secured his certificate earlier. The main purpose of the amendment is to accomplish that. There is another provision to it which the committee can take up, but it is a very brief bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee received from the Veterans' Bureau an adverse report on this bill. I will say to the Senator that in the Thursday morning meeting I shall ask the committee to consider the bill to which he refers. I do not promise what action the committee will take on it.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator will ask the committee to take it up Thursday morning?

Mr. SMOOT. Thursday morning.

Mr. BLACK. That will be satisfactory.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate to see whether it might not be possible to temporarily postpone debate on an appropriation bill and proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9462) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment. That bill was reported to the House on February 25, passed that body by a vote of 205 to 109 on the 27th of that month, and was promptly reported to the Senate on the 2d of March. It is an emergency measure, as is shown by its title, yet the bill has not received emergency treatment by the Senate.

The bill was discussed on March 11 by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Oddie] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGill with complete detail to satisfy anyone of its merits. All the affirmative arguments necessary were presented at that time. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] on that day spoke briefly, and then subsequently addressed the Senate at greater length on March 16 in opposition to the measure.

The Senate has indicated no disposition to expedite the passage of the appropriation bills. In all my service in Congress I have never seen this late in a long session of Congress but one appropriation bill a law, and that one a deficiency bill. If Senators will look at the back of the calendar they will find that the Agricultural appropriation bill was reported to the Senate on February 18 and was under consideration for 19 days in this body before it passed. The Interior Department appropriation bill was reported on March 1, and it has not as yet passed the Senate. For some unaccountable but very apparent reason the brakes are on. The Senate is not passing appropriation bills. There appears to be no hurry with respect to such measures. But there is urgent need for the passage of the emergency highway construction bill.

One might well suspect that there exists a cold-blooded, deliberate determination to delay the passage of the road bill until the cold weather is over-and to-day is the first day of spring-in the hope that the emergency, like the winter, may pass away and then there would be no necessity for its enactment. With the coming of summer there will be, of course, some increase in seasonal employment which may temporarily take up some of the unemployment slack; but this legislation, which is designed to immediately put men to work, if it is going to be acted upon at all, ought to be passed now.

I have recently noticed in the newspapers kind and philosophical suggestions that the poor be persuaded to plant gardens so that they may sustain themselves on carrots and turnips and string beans and other garden truck. The unemployed can, like cattle in the fields, adopt a vegetable diet. There is no work; let them vegetate.

Then there is spinach, which every dietitian will say is excellent for the human system. By planting crops of spinach the poor can grow healthy even if unemployed. Kindhearted philanthropists also highly recommend broccoli as wonderful for filling an empty paunch. With a stomach full of broccoli any man out of a job can peek around the corner and see prosperity coming down the street. All such plans may help the unemployed to eke out a mere existence, but what the jobless want is work, not vegetables.

I repeat my protest against delay in the consideration of the emergency highway construction bill. The steering committee should arrange some method whereby the Senate may take it up, give it the consideration it deserves, and pass it. All the committee amendments to the bill have been agreed to, and three perfecting amendments offered by different Senators have been adopted. There is now pending only one amendment to the bill offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] which provides that the apportionment of Federal-aid funds shall be not in the usual form, on the basis of population, area, and mileage of the postroads, but upon population only.

A change of that kind is an entering wedge to wreck the entire Federal aid highway system. The apportionment of Federal aid funds on a population basis alone does not justify this legislation. The only justification for the appropriations to be made pursuant to this bill is a wise expenditure of funds to the best advantage of a national highway transportation system. The wholesale construction of highways without regard to future traffic demands is both wasteful and foolish. The State highway departments are all organized to allocate road funds for the highest economic benefit and where the greatest necessity exists. Transportation surveys are cooperatively carried on by the State and Federal authorities to determine accurately where highways should be improved to satisfy the greatest legitimate demand. Justification for the passage of this emergency road bill is the same as was set forth by the President of the United States a little over a year ago, in December, 1930, when he recommended the passage of similar legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator be so good as to tell us about when he expects to move to take this bill up?

Mr. HAYDEN. I hope that after I have presented this matter to the Senate we may reach an agreement with respect to that very thing. The sooner the better, of course.

Mr. President, in December, 1930, President Hoover sent a special message to Congress transmitting a Budget estimate for $150,000,000 for public works to relieve unemployment. In that message he said:

The application of this money to work already authorized by the Congress not only limits its application to work already directed by Congress but assures its use in directions the economic importance of which has already been determined by Congress. This plan also avoids the long delays incident to selection of new projects by Congress and the further long delays in technical preparation which new projects would require, both of which would render such action of no purpose in emergency relief of unemployment.

If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut shall be adopted, the entire system will be changed. More money will be placed in some States in which they do not know where to use it, and less money will go to other States where plans have already been made to carry out that character of work which will give employment to those who sadly need it.

Maricopa County, Ariz., where I was born, is as large as the State of Connecticut, where my father was born. Arizona is as large as all of New England and New York combined. If we are to have a national system of improved highways to bind the States of the Union more firmly together, all the miles in Arizona, just like all the miles in New England now comprising a part of that designated and approved system, must ultimately be built. Area, of necessity, therefore, must be an equal factor with population in the apportionment of Federal aid for highways.

I beg of Senators to be national, to have the vision to see beyond the boundaries of some States that are no larger than some counties, and, as Governor Gilpin, of Colorado, was fond of saying, to "think continentally." My father said that when he was a small boy in the Connecticut River Valley, they spoke of going out West when it was necessary to make a trip to New York State. Communication was so poor and general contact between the people of the two States was so infrequent that there was also a persistent rumor that Dutchmen lived on the Hudson who wore wooden shoes. Now, it is nothing wonderful for Professor Sharp, of Boston University, to go by automobile to Santa Barbara in search of "the better country." One can drive his car from Minneapolis to Galveston on a Federal-aid highway. America is no longer sectional but a nation. Let us build roads as a great nation should.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is the last Member of this body who should be provincial. He has been in many far and strange places on this earth. As an intrepid explorer and a great traveler he has utilized almost every known method of conveyance from the lowly South American burro to the most speedy airplane. The Senator knows the supreme necessity for good roads and no one sets a higher value on them as a means of national defense. I am surprised that my friend would even offer an amendment the effect of which is to establish a precedent that means that a truly national system of highways can not be built.

The Senator from Connecticut, in the remarks he made a few days ago, indicated that money spent upon the roads in one States is of no benefit to the people of another State. He would have the American people believe that. Permit me to read very briefly from a press release given out by the Bureau of Public Roads on the very day that the emergency highway construction bill passed the House of Representatives. This is a statement authorized by the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads. I want to say in this connection that Mr. MacDonald, of the Bureau of Public Roads, like Mr. Norcross of the Forest Service, like Mr. Albright of the National Park Service, and Mr. Dodd of the Indian Service, all of whom appeared before committees of the Senate to discuss road legislation, was not a voluntary witness. Each appeared only at the request of the committee and gave their testimony in answer to questions from Senators. This is what the Bureau of Public Roads said about the final distribution of the road dollar:

About 75 per cent of the cost of a high-type pavement filters back through the transportation companies and through industry to men who work for salaries and wages far distant from where these highways are built. Most of these men are city workers employed by the transportation companies or in the mills and factories—men who may never see more than a few of the highways. Their efforts help to build, but, who taken altogether, receive several times as much in salaries and wages as is paid to the men who are directly employed in building them.

I ask leave to include the entire press release of the Bureau of Public Roads printed as an exhibit to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Dickinson in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. HAYDEN. It is strange to me that those who now object to the passage of emengency highway-construction legislation made no objection in December, 1930, when the President submitted a Budget estimate for $150,000,000 to provide work for the unemployed and included in it $30,000,000 for Federal aid to be expended in the identical manner provided in this bill, to wit, that the money may be used in lieu of State funds to match Federal aid. I ask leave to incorporate in the Record as further exhibits to my remarks the Budget estimate submitted by the President, and the act passed pursuant to it, so that those who read the Record may see clearly that there is no deviation in principle between what we are proposing to do in this bill and what Congress and the President did a little over a year ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibits B and C.)

Mr. HAYDEN. What has happened in the meantime to induce Senators to say that what was entirely proper in December, 1930, is wholly improper in March, 1932? Has the depression ended? Is there less employment in the United States to-day than there was at that time?

Mr. President, the American people pay for roads whether they have them or not. Why not have roads which must be paid for anyhow? Motor-propelled vehicles now transport the bulk of the Nation's goods of every description. Operated on well-built roads, the cost of transportation is greatly reduced. Driven laboriously over bad roads, the maintenance cost of such vehicles is immediately increased. The people who own automobiles, and most of them do, must pay either way. It may be a gasoline tax or a "mud tax," but they pay it just the same, and one form of tax equals the other.

Dick Wick Hall of Salome, "where she danced," once said that a chuck hole is a bump upside down. However defined, chuck holes and bumps are bad for every kind of a car. Any man who has skidded through the mud into a ditch believes in good roads. Every farmer who is so fortunate as to be able to catch the top of the market by loading some part of his crops on trucks and trailers and quickly moving the same to town over a hard-surfaced road knows that he has saved more than his share of the cost of the highway. And so it is throughout the entire United States. There are none who do not know that well-built roads pay perpetual dividends and that in the end bad roads cost as much as good roads.

The purpose of this bill is to build more good roads, to make a capital investment in roads when they can be bought for less than ever before and when they will be better built for the money than at any other time in all history. Ninetenths of every dollar expended on roads ultimately goes to labor. The enactment of this legislation will promote employment by doing road work which is ready to be accomplished. The surveys are done. The plans are made. The location, the grade and curvature, the cuts and fills, are all known, so that there will be no delay in commencing construction.

The testimony of responsible officials given before committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives shows that the sums contained in the bill combined with regular appropriations heretofore authorized from the Federal Treasury for expenditure between the date when it becomes a law and June 30, 1933, will provide employment for labor to about the same extent as was advanced from the same source for the same purpose during the calendar year 1931. This means that approximately an equal number of men will be doing road work during the next 16 months as were employed last year, which is possible because costs of almost every kind have been reduced. If the bill is not passed, tens of thousands of men who were at work on the roads in 1931 will be thrown back into the body of the unemployed, a crime of which the Federal Government should not be guilty.

The Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives has reported a bill designed to raise enough revenue to balance the Federal Budget not on June 30, 1932, but one year later, on June 30, 1933. The passage of this road construction bill and the prompt appropriation of the sums authorized to be expended pursuant to its terms will not interfere with balancing the Budget. Every Senator should know that the sum of all expenditures less the total Federal income is the amount which will be added to the public debt at the beginning of the next fiscal year, July 1, 1932. If the revenue bill as finally enacted levies sufficient taxes, the Treasury will start out with a clean slate and with a fair prospect that thereafter the increased income thus procured will make unnecessary further additions to the public debt.

I therefore do not hesitate to assert that this bill can be passed and the work under it carried on within a balanced Federal Budget such as is proposed to be established by the Committee on Ways and Means and the Treasury Department. The procedure in this instance will differ in no respect whatsoever from that which must be adopted to meet the demands of other emergency measures approved at the present session of Congress, of which the $500,000,000 appropriated for the use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the chief example.

I concede that it may be necessary to borrow every cent that will be expended on highway construction if the bill should become a law. Looking at the Budget in one way, as it exists to-day, certain fixed charges are absorbing the entire revenue of the Federal Government. The total income of the Government is now about $2,300,000,000. The interest on the public debt is about $600,000,000; the cost of national defense, the Army, Navy, and so forth, is about $700,000,000; and $1,000,000,000 more is paid out for the relief of veterans, which sums take up all of the revenue of the Government. That means, of course, that every other expenditure is made out of borrowed money.

Where is the Federal Government going to get the money to pay for the work authorized to be done by this bill? Senators who now so boldly ask that question did not make any such inquiry when the act to create the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was under consideration in this body. Then there was not a whisper from anyone of them to raise a doubt as to where that $500,000,000 could be obtained. Such Senators favored that bill and therefore asked no questions. They are opposed to the purposes of this bill; they do not want to give work to the unemployed and therefore suddenly become most inquisitive. My answer to these Senators is—and I make the answer most respectfully—that this emergency appropriation of $136,000,000 is to come from exactly the same sources as the $500,000,000 to be expended by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to meet another kind of an emergency. In every taxation and budgetary particular the two appropriations are identical.

The Treasury will end this fiscal year with a deficit of about $2,000,000,000, which must be carried over into the public debt, but if revenue legislation is enacted, as I believe it will be, to raise enough taxes to balance the Budget thereafter, the ordinary operating expenses of the Government will, I repeat, be met by the increased revenue during the coming fiscal year.

At the time they voted for the foreign-debt moratorium last December did Senators say just how the loss of $252,000,000 was to be made up? They did not. The Treasury is out just as much money through failure to make a collection when due as it is by the expenditure of an equal amount. Senators approved of the moratorium secure in the faith that a way would be found to balance the Budget despite that loss. Now there is just as good reason to have faith that all of the sums contained in this bill can be included within a balanced Budget.

France had the money on hand to pay what she owed the United States last December. France is not in financial distress, she has over a quarter of the gold in the whole world, and will pay all that is due on her debt next December. England will also pay whatever sums are due the United States at the close of the year. The English had the sound business sense to quit spending millions in a vain and fruitless effort to maintain the gold standard.

The decline in the gold value of the pound sterling has not only stimulated business in Great Britain with a consequent increase in the revenues of its Government but has also caused a flood of gold to pour into London from India and all parts of the British Empire. A pound sterling, whose purchasing power within the Empire has been but little affected, can now be bought for over a dollar less in gold than its old par value of $4.86. That is why millions of people under the British flag are turning hoarded gold into paper pounds and also explains why the English Government has found means to repay $150,000,000 in bank credits six months before they are due. England will pay next December.

As further proof of Great Britain's ability to pay, I quote from the weekly report of business conditions issued by the Alexander Hamilton Institute on March 12, 1932:

THE BRITISH SITUATION

For quite some time it has been evident that economic conditions in Great Britain were improving. As signs of this improvement there may be mentioned the lowering of the discount rate from 6 to 5 per cent, the improvement in the security markets, and, above all, a substantial rise in the value of the pound. Further evidence of this improvement may be found in the fact that not only was the Bank of England in a position to repay the $250,000,000 due to the Federal reserve banks and the Bank of France but also that the British Government was able to repay a substantial amount of the $400,000,000 contracted last summer in the United States and in France. It is reported that the amount due in the United States was reduced from $200,000,000 and the amount due in France was reduced from $200,000,000 to $135,000,000.

I have digressed briefly to mention this source of income to the Federal Treasury to allay the fears of those who are in such a panic that they can not see any way to provide work for the unemployed through road construction. I am well aware that it is not practical to specifically earmark the payments on the debts due from foreign countries for the purpose of paying for highway building in the United States, but it does help to cheer up the pessimists who, after voting for every other emergency appropriation, are now alarmed that Uncle Sam may go broke.

Suppose, for the sake of argument, that there is a difference between the way the money must be found to pay to labor on roads and the way in which it must be found to meet appropriations for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and I do not admit for a moment that such is the fact. But suppose that it is, and that in each case the money had to be borrowed. I claim that the purpose of this bill is entirely worthy and that the Government can save enough in the purchase price of the roads to be bought with this money to pay interest even as high as 4 per cent for over six years. Six years from now, when prices are again | restored to their prepanic level, there will be no saving of 25 per cent in the cost of highway construction.

Let me read from the testimony of Mr. Thomas H. Mac-Donald, Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives on December 17, 1931, wherin the cost of roads is

The CHAIRMAN. There has been a decrease in the cost of construction, has there not?

Mr. MacDonald. There has been a material decrease, Mr. Chairman. Compositely, we estimate that it is 25 per cent under the base price that prevailed over the 5-year period 1925-1929. It varies as between items, of course, but taking the average cost, or the composite cost, for road work for 1925 to 1929, our estimate on the same basis would be just about 25 per cent under that cost.

The Charraman. Do you think we will get probably 25 per cent more mileage?

Mr. MacDonald. Yes, sir.

The CHARMAN. For the same amount of money? Mr. MacDonald. We will get 25 per cent more units.

This testimony proves that it is entirely possible to carry out the purpose of the bill, which, as I said, is to make a capital investment at a time when more roads can be bought for the same amount of money than ever before in the history of the United States.

I ask Senators to seriously consider this question. Are we going to pass this bill? Is there any hope that it will be considered? If we shall follow the program laid out by the steering committee, let us see where we will arrive. Appropriation bills have the right of way. After that we are to consider, first, an act to amend the tariff act of 1930. There is not a Senator, a regular Republican, on the other side of the Chamber but will say that if that bill shall pass both Houses of Congress it will be vetoed.

The next measure upon the steering committee list is a Senate resolution to investigate the effect of the depreciation of foreign currency values upon importations of important commodities into the United States. Very valuable information, no doubt, will be obtained from such an investigation, but will it give anybody a job? Will it relieve unem-

Last upon the list is a bill to authorize the building of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington-London naval treaty. I have always advocated an adequate Navy; I shall probably vote for the bill; but it will not put anybody to work; it is a mere authorization. We may debate it here for a long, long time. It is perfectly evident that if the consideration of this road bill is to be put behind every appropriation bill, behind all three of the measures mentioned, and it is to take its place behind some other bills on a program hereafter to be laid out by the steering committee, it will be away into the summer before the bill can possibly be enacted.

I have made this statement, Mr. President, with the hope that my colleagues in the Senate will give serious consideration to the question involved in order to ascertain whether or not some way may not be found whereby this important piece of legislation may be placed upon its passage. It represents no wild or extravagant proposal. The emergency highway construction bill makes the total expenditures for road work about equal to what was done last year. The bill will permit work to be done which is ready to be done. Let Congress say that it shall be done.

LABOR GETS GREAT SHARE OF HIGHWAY EXPENDITURE

At least 85 per cent and possibly more than 90 per cent of the money expended for a concrete pavement is ultimately paid out as wages and salaries, according to the Bureau of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agriculture.

This conclusion is reached as a result of studies of typical concrete construction jobs and it is believed to be approximately true for other high-type pavements. Expenditures were traced back through various channels until the money went into personal use.

About 15 per cent of the cost of concrete pavements is paid to

About 15 per cent of the cost of concrete pavements is paid to men employed directly on the construction jobs. About 12 per cent is paid to men employed in quarries, sand pits, mills, and factories where the materials are produced, and about 14 per cent is paid to men employed by the transportation companies (principally the railroads) for hauling these materials to the jobs. Part of the cost is paid to the men who build the machinery and equipment used in constructing highway. Even more is paid to equipment used in constructing highways. Even more is paid to the men who build the machinery and equipment used in the sand pits, the quarries, the cement mills, and the steel mills where road materials are produced, and to those who build the equipment of companies that deliver these materials. Some is paid to the miners, the men who work in the refineries, and those who work on the pipe lines and in the oil fields—the industries which pro-on the pipe lines and in the oil fields—the industries which provide the fuel that produces the power used in producing materials, in transporting them, and in working them into finished pavements.

A part of the cost of high-type roads goes to those industries which furnish the supplies used all along the line. Some goes to the men who make blasting powder; some to those who make hand tools, and even the very minor items, such as cotton waste and the sheet of emery paper with which the mechanic smooths a joint on a machine he is repairing, absorb a bit of the cost at which pavements are built.

About 75 per cent of the cost of a high-type pavement filters.

About 75 per cent of the cost of a high-type pavement filters back through the transportation companies and through industry to men who work for salaries and wages at points distant from where these highways are built. Most of these men are city workers employed by the transportation companies or in the mills and factories—men who may never see more than a few of the highways their efforts helped to build—but who, taken together, receive several times as much in salaries and wages as is paid to the men who are directly employed in building them the men who are directly employed in building them.

The bureau's studies further show that out of every $100 paid to the contractors who build concrete pavements—and much the same thing is true of high-type highway construction generally—more than $40 passes through the hands of the transportation companies (principally railroads) and assists these companies in maintaining a profitable volume of business. Approximately $13 is paid to the producers of aggregate (sand, gravel, broken stone, and slag); about $24 goes to the cement mills. At least $16 ultimately goes to the manufacturers of machinery and equipment, including trucks, railroad cars, locomotives, etc. Some is paid to the manufacturers of explosives; some to the producers of coal; some to the gasoline refineries; and much to manufacturers who contribute in lesser degree by supplying materials used by those who produce the materials used in highway construction and those who transport them or who build the equipment used at some point in the long series of processes out of which highways

From these facts it is apparent that the construction of highways, particularly those of the higher types, not only provides work for those employed on the job but that it provides a great deal more work for men employed in industry and in transportation; and that, in addition to this, it supplies a large volume of business to those industries through which the materials that must be used are collected, worked, and reworked before they become a part of a finished pavement.

[House Document No. 655, Seventy-first Congress, third session] EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION FUND ESTIMATE OF AN APPROPRIATION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1931

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Washington, December 4, 1930. The Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress an estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year 1931, amounting to $150,000,000, for an emergency construction fund to enable the Chief Executive to accelerate work on construction projects already authorized by law so as to increase employment.

In my annual message to the Congress I requested that an appropriation of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 be granted for this purpose, and this estimate is in furtherance of that request. As I stated in that message, the application of this money to work already authorized by the Congress not only limits its application to work already directed by Congress but assures its use in directions the economic importance of which has already been determined by Congress. This plan also avoids the long delays incident to selection of new projects by Congress and the further long delays in technical preparation which new projects would require, both of which would render such action of no purpose in quire, both of which would render such action of no purpose in emergency relief of unemployment.

I suggested in my message that the allocation of the moneys between the different authorized projects should be made upon recommendation of a committee of the Cabinet. Such a committee should comprise the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, Navy, Commerce, and Agriculture, and may be established in the terms of the appropriation or appointed by me.

The test of the value of such relief is the ability to pay wages between now and the end of the fiscal year, and I therefore urge that this estimate be given early consideration.

The details concerning this estimate are set forth in the letter of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, transmitted herewith.

Respectfully, HERBERT HOOVER

> BUREAU OF THE BUDGET Washington, D. C.

Sin: By your direction, I have the honor to submit herewith a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year 1931 for the purpose of accelerating during the remainder of the current fiscal year such work on authorized governmental construction projects as will increase employment during the present emergency, as follows:

Emergency construction fund_____

In response to your request I have canvassed the departments with a view to ascertaining how much money could be spent during the next six months with a view to aiding the unemployment situation if additional funds could be provided.

This canvass has been conducted with the limitations which you indicated kept clearly in mind, namely, (1) items which would require additional congressional authorization have been eliminated, (2) items which do not afford direct benefit to the employment situation within the next six months have been eliminated, (3) only such items have been included as are believed to be justified on their merits and for which money would be provided within the next few years as Government finances would permit, and (4) while some of these projects can not be fully completed within the next six months and will necessarily involve some additional future expenditure to complete them the emptor. some additional future expenditure to complete them, the emphasis has been laid in every case upon the relief which would be afforded to the unemployment situation during the next six months and projects which would involve materially larger expenditures in the future to complete them have been eliminated, except in those cases where the commencement of the project is contemplated in the 1932 estimates now before Congress.

In view of the necessary technical work in the preparation of plans and estimates, the acquisition of sites, etc., it is impossible at this time to make an absolute determination of all the projects upon which money can be effectively and efficiently spent for the purpose of aiding employment within the next six months. I am still conducting hearings on these proposals of the departments in order to be in a position to recommend to you from time to time the projects to which I believe money should be allocated if an appropriation for this purpose is provided.

For your information, I append a list by departments and bureaus of the amounts which it is believed could effectively be spent during the next six months for aid to the employment situation.

By far the greater part of these projects are not provided for in the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1932 transmitted in the Budget, but there are some items in the list which have been so included in the 1932 Budget. It is my understanding that should it be practicable and advisable to allocate part of the emergency appropriation to these items, any money appropriated in the 1932 appropriation acts for the same purpose could be impounded by the department concerned under instruction from you unless required for the continuation of the same project.

It is pertinent to mention a fact which has been repeatedly developed in the course of the hearings upon these items, namely, that the amount of benefit to the employment situation during the next six months is not fully reflected in the amount of money expended by the Government during that period, as on contracting work where there is a lag of from one or two months or more bebetween the actual execution of the work and the Federal payment for it. This is particularly true with regard to Federal-aid highway for it. This is particularly true with regard to Federal-aid highway construction, where the lag frequently exceeds three months. In other words, the contractor is paying the wages of the workmen and buying material for a particular job a month or two before money is paid out of the Federal Treasury to reimburse him.

This supplemental estimate of appropriation is required to meet an emergency which has arisen since the transmission of the Budget for the fiscal year 1931.

Very respectfully,

J. CLAWSON ROOP.

J. CLAWSON ROOP, Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

C., supp. 3, title 33, sec. 702a), $3,000,000, to remain available until expended. Sec. 2. The sums herein appropriated shall be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects named in this act upon of the President stating the amounts and the appropriations between which such interchanges are to be made.

SEC. 3. A report shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session showing by projects or other appro-priate detailed classification the amounts allocated under each of the foregoing appropriations, the expenditures under each allocation, and such other information which the President may deem pertinent in advising Congress as to the allocation and expenditure of such appropriations.

Approved, December 20, 1930.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and thorougly agree with every statement he has made in regard to the emergency road bill. The bill passed the House of Representatives February 27. On March 1, as chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, I called a special meeting of that committee, with a view to considering and reporting the bill promptly to the Senate. Considerable progress was made at the first meeting of the committee, and the following day I called another meeting, as a result of which the bill was reported favorably to the Senate by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], accompanied with an able report, which he prepared, and the bill was placed on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. President, I have been trying since that time to find an opportunity to secure action on the bill. I moved that it be taken up on March 11 during the morning hour. The motion was agreed to, and I made a somewhat detailed statement regarding the bill. We could not dispose of the measure on that occasion before 2 o'clock arrived. I am hoping that we may get another opportunity within the next few days to act on the bill.

Mr. President, I will not now delay the Senate to argue the matter. I made a statement concerning the bill on the 11th of March. At that time I went into detail quite carefully and showed that for every man who works on roads two men work behind the line in the factory and in the mines, and so forth. That statement thoroughly refutes the contention advanced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] a few days ago that a large proportion of the benefits of this legislation, if enacted, would go to sections of the country that have the least population. If the proposed legislation shall be passed, it will mean that men in the large communities now unemployed will obtain work; it will mean a fair distribution of the money which will be expended. The passage of the bill will result in about 800,000 men being placed or kept at work. In my opinion, the number will be nearer a million men. If this bill shall be passed, the men who will be put to work will help start the wheels of industry turning throughout the country.

Mr. President, I am tired of hearing proposed as a remedy for existing conditions the wholesale cutting of expenses, the elimination of necessary activities, which will mean throwing more men out of employment. Why not indulge in a little wholesome optimism and, instead of throwing men out of employment and swelling the army of unemployed and increasing distress, help as best we can in starting the wheels of industry? We are taking a wrong view of the existing situation and suggesting the wrong remedies. We are thus helping to prolong the period of distress. Why not start in to-day and try to set a time for the passage of this bill, and in so doing put an end, so far as possible, to the pessimistic talk and thought that are going through the country and endeavor to breathe a little optimism into our daily lives and into the public mind and help bring back prosperity and normal times once more?

I hope we shall find an opportunity within the next few days to bring this bill up. The President recently declared for continuation of work on waterways and harbor construction and stated that dislocation of construction work and unemployment would otherwise result. The same thing should be done in regard to the emergency road bill we are now discussing. Pass this bill in the Senate and men will be put to work and the end of the period of depression will be nearer in sight.

Mr. President, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point an interesting article from the Reno Evening Gazette, of Reno, Nev., on March 12, 1932, which discusses a report of the Bureau of Public Roads showing that a large part of the money expended on roads goes to

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Reno Evening Gazette, March 12, 1932] ROAD PAVING COIN GOES MOSTLY TO WAGE EARNERS

At least 85 per cent of the money paid for concrete pavement ultimately is paid out as wages and salaries, the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, states, on the basis of studies of movement of money paid in road construction. The conclusion is believed to be true of other high-type pavement also, the bureau said.

The money goes into wages not only in actual construction of highways, the bureau found, but also in railroads, machinery factories, quarries, cement mills, oil fields, mines, and other phases of industry. A statement by the department summarizing the bureau's findings follows in full text:

At least 85 per cent and possibly more than 90 per cent of the money expended for a concrete pavement is ultimately paid out as wages and salaries, according to the Bureau of Public Roads.

This conclusion is reached as a result of studies of typical concrete construction jobs and it is believed to be approximately true for other high-type pavements. Expenditures were traced back through various channels until the money went into personal use.

About 15 per cent of the cost of concrete pavements is paid to men employed directly on the construction jobs. Above 12 per cent is paid to men employed in quarries, sand pits, mills, and factories where the materials are produced, and about 14 per cent is paid to men employed by the transportation companies (principally the railroads) for hauling these materials to the jobs.

Part of the cost is paid to the men who build the machinery and equipment used in constructing highways. Even more is and equipment used in constructing highways. Even more is paid to the men who build the machinery and equipment used in the sand pits, the quarries, the cement mills, and the steel mills where road materials are produced, and to those who build the equipment of companies that deliver these materials.

Some is paid to the miners, the men who work in the refineries, and those who work on the pipe lines and in the oil fields—the industries which provide the fuel that produces the power used in producing materials, in transporting them, and in working them into finished payements.

A part of the cost of high-type roads goes to those industries which furnish the supplies used all along the line. Some goes to the men who make blasting powder; some of those who make hand tools, and even the very minor items, such as cotton waste and the sheet of emery paper with which the mechanic smooths a joint on a machine he is repairing, absorb a bit of the cost at which payements are built. which pavements are built.

About 75 per cent of the cost of a high-type pavement filters back through the transportation companies and through industry to men who work for salaries and wages at points distant from where these highways are built. Most of these men are city workers employed by the transportation companies or in the mills and factories—men who may never see more than a few of the highways their efforts help to build, but who, taken together, receive several times as much in salaries and wages as is paid to the men several times as much in salaries and wages as is paid to the men who are directly employed in building them.

The bureau's studies further show that out of every $100 paid to the contractors who build concrete pavements—and much the same thing is true of high-type highway construction generally—more than $40 passes through the hands of the transportation companies (principally railroads) and assists these companies in maintaining a profitable volume of business. Approximately $13 is paid to the producers of aggregate (sand, gravel, broken stone, and slag); about $24 goes to the cement mills.

At least $16 ultimately goes to the manufacturers of machinery and equipment, including trucks, railroad cars, locomotives, etc. Some is paid to the manufacturers of explosives; some to the producers of coal; some to the gasoline refineries; and much to manufacturers who contribute in lesser degree by supplying materials used by those who produce the materials used in highway construction, and those who transport them or who build the equipment used at some point in the long series of processes out of which highways result.

From these facts it is apparent that the construction of high-ways, particularly those of the higher types, not only provides work for those employed on the job but that it provides a great deal more work for men employed in industry and in transporta-tion; and that, in addition to this, it supplies a large volume of business to those industries through which the materials that must be used are collected, worked, and reworked before they become a part of a finished pavement.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope we may now proceed with the pending bill so that we may get it out of the way and perhaps be able to consider some of the other measures, which have been mentioned.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill for committee amendments.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Title I-Department of State, foreign intercourse, ambassadors, and ministers," on page 6. line 1, after the word "to," to strike out "the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes" and insert "Yugoslavia," so as to read:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Albania, Austria, Bolivia, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Dominion of Canada, Ecuador, Egypt, Finland, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Irish Free State, Liberia, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Persia, Portugal, Rumania, Salvador, Siam, Union of South Africa, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay, and Venezuela, at $10,000 each; Yugoslavia, $10,000; and to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service," on page 12, at the end of line 3, to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$300,000," so as to read:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the com-mercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 107), $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Post allowances to Foreign Service officers," on page 12, line 14, to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to read:

For post allowances as authorized by the act approved February 23, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 22, sec. 12), $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Representation allowances," on page 12, at the end of line 24, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to read:

For representation allowances, as authorized by the act approved February 23, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 22, sec. 12), $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the rate of speed with which the Senate is proceeding to increase the appropriations contained in the bill seems rather strange when we compare the legislative situation with that which prevailed during the consideration of the Interior Department appropriation bill.

As I recall, about one week was spent in discussing an appropriation involving, according to my memory, some $25,000 or $27,000 for the eradication of barberry bushes which produce a spore that causes rust on the farmer's grain. Hours and days were spent in trying to cut that appropriation something like $25,000 or $27,000, and yet I counted the seconds, as nearly as seconds can be counted, and I found that in a twinkling of an eye and without objection the Senate increased the appropriation on page 12, line 3,

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BLAINE. For the Diplomatic and Consular Service overseas the appropriation is increased $100,000, for what purpose, I do not know. There was not a word of explanation why there should be that increase, and there was not even a whisper on the part of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, who is now on his feet, against that increase; the Senator who so ably fought against any increase in the Interior Department appropriation bill, who so vigorously opposed-

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLAINE. The reinstatement of $25,000 or $27,000 for the eradication of barberry bushes which produce rust upon wheat and other grain of the farmers. Not a protest against the $100,000 increase in this instance was voiced by the Senator from Tennessee, nor was a protest raised by any other Senator.

Then I find that the very next item for Foreign Service officers is increased from $50,000 to $100,000 in less than, to repeat, the twinkling of an eye.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. BLAINE. It went through without a protest from the Senators who were so vigorously opposed to the reinstatement of the small amount to which I have referred.
We went so fast that I am not certain about which amendment is now pending, but I assume it is the amendment at the bottom of page 12. Let me inquire what is the amendment now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk informs the Chair that the Senate is now considering the amendment on

For representation allowances, as authorized by the act approved February 23, 1931—

I do not know what that is about, and no one has told us what it is about, but here is an increase over and above the amount allowed by the House of 300 per cent, the appropriation being increased from $25,000 to $100,000, and not even a whisper is heard on the part of those who so vigorously.——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. And with economy rushing out of their throats in great floods of oratory—

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator apparently is going on without yielding, I will sit down.

Mr. BLAINE. Like water going over Niagara, opposed the small item to which I have referred, and not a moment is spent by the Senate in considering this increase. Now I yield to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator understood the parliamentary situation, I do not think he would grow so eloquent. The other day the Vice President ruled that a motion to recommit with instructions to reduce the amount of appropriations 10 per cent as carried in another bill should be made just before the third reading of the bill and after the bill had been considered and completed. Basing my action on that ruling, I allowed, and the whole Senate allowed, unanimous consent to be granted to have the pending bill read for committee amendments, and it is now being so read.

I want to say to the Senator that I understand it is in accord with parliamentary procedure to move at any time to recommit this bill with instructions to provide a 10 per cent reduction, and I am going to make such a motion as soon as the unanimous consent under which we are now operating has expired.

I want to say to the Senator further that I very much hope that the motion to recommit with instructions to reduce the appropriations carried by the bill 10 per cent on all items or on the total will be agreed to as was a similar motion the other day in the case of the Interior Department appropriation bill, and, if it shall be agreed to, what is now being done is a matter of no importance whatsoever. If, however, the Senate shall not agree to that, then those of us who want to reduce appropriations are out of luck.

I desire to say to the Senator that when these amendments have been passed on, if we have to proceed with the third reading of the bill, there are a number of other amendments that will be offered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President-

Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator.

The Senator suggests that I do not understand the parliamentary status of the bill. I quite well understand the parliamentary status of the bill. I assume from what the Senator has said that he proposes to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the amount of appropriations contained in it 10 per cent below the amount authorized by the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator spent nearly two weeks— motion to recommit, which thereby instructed the committee and I am not criticizing him for it—in his effort to prevent to make a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. Without in-the increases in the Interior Department bill that had been recommended by the Senate committee over and above the House committee recommendations. The Senator, while he was doing that, had just as much assurance that the bill would be recommitted as he has assurance, or at least as he asserts he has assurance, that this bill will be recommitted on his motion in this respect.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. Blaine. But supposing that motion does not prevail. Then the Senate will have approved these enormous increases without any explanation of why they are made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator has the floor. Why does not he ask for an explanation?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not occupy the exclusive franchise on economy that the Senator from Tennessee did in his two weeks' assault upon the $25,000 or $27,000 barberry eradication, and some small amount that was to be taken away from the Indians, and some other cheeseparing proposals for economy.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is open to all 96 of us. There is nothing exclusive about it.

Mr. BLAINE. I simply wanted to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that when these increases were being made of 100 per cent and 300 per cent, these valiant defenders of the Public Treasury and the taxpayers of this country sat in silence. So, Mr. President, it is not sufficient to say that the motion which the Senator proposes to make will prevail. It may not prevail.

I observe that in this appropriation bill there is carried an item of over $11,000,000 for the enforcement of prohibition. When the Senator begins to talk about decreasing the appropriation for prohibition enforcement I wonder whether or not he will have the courage to prevail against the bludgeon of the Anti-Saloon League. Ah! I am not so sure, Mr. President, that there will be any success in recommitting this bill in the face of the proposition to reduce the appropriation for the enforcement of prohibition over a million dollars. How can we have any assurance to that effect when the Senate has so overwhelmingly voted "dry" upon a resolution promoted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Bingham]? If we are to take the sentiment of the Senate as recorded by that vote, there is every assurance that the Senator's motion to recommit will not prevail.

Therefore, Mr. President, those of us who believe not in a cheeseparing policy, not in whittling off a penny here and a nickel there, we who believe that economy can be practiced only through cutting off appropriations in great chunks, must deal with the various items in the bill as they arise. The Senator from Tennessee was quite willing to pare off a little here and pare off a little there.

I do not want to point out the Senator from Tennessee particularly. I honor the Senator for the fight he made for economy in some respects. I have not any doubt but that he had the deepest convictions upon the subject. I have not any doubt but that his ability and persuasiveness led the Senate to recommit that bill with instructions to reduce it 10 per cent; but we have not any assurance now that the sentiment that prevails in the Senate upon the question of prohibition is ever going to permit this bill to be recommitted with instruction that 10 per cent be carved off the prohibition enforcement appropriation.

So, Mr. President, in trying to put on the brakes in this excessive speed with which we were going in appropriating additional money over and above what is provided in the House bill, running as high as 300 per cent, I merely thought it might be the part of consistency at least on my part, as one who voted for the motion of the Senator to recommit, to call the attention of the Senate to these particular items, and ask that the Chair at least give an opportunity for a Member to catch his breath, so that he might have the opportunity to inquire of the chairman of the committee what the increase is for, and why it is made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I did not vote for the motion to recommit, which thereby instructed the committee tending in an unparliamentary way to criticize the sponsor of the motion or those who voted for it, I believe it will soon be demonstrated that that motion was the climax of foolishness, the apex of ridiculousness in legislative matters, for this reason:

There were items in the appropriation bill which could not be reduced 10 per cent. They were fixed charges. The good faith of the Government was pledged. Contracts were let. How can legislators, therefore, make a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent?

I believe the Senator from Wisconsin is correct now in his conclusion that we can not economize by making a flat reduction, willy nilly, of 10 per cent.

There are items in this bill that ought to be cut 25 or 40 per cent. There are some items that ought to be increased. Oh, how easy would be the task of legislating if we for sooth brought in a bill, looked at the total, and cut it off 10 per cent! It would relieve us of the privilege, rarely employed nowadays, of thinking.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator that the motion I made does not require an arbitrary reduction of each item of the bill at all. The committee has full latitude to deal with each item of the bill, just as before. The only thing the 10 per cent reduction motion requires is that the total be reduced 10 per cent; that is all.

Mr. ASHURST. In other words, the Senate is so debilitated and so reduced in courage and in discernment that it is unable to make its own reductions, but it must needs send the bill back to the committee to make reductions for it. Unable to make our own computations, so feeble in mental processes that we can not conduct our own arithmetic, we send the bill back to the committee to compute for us, or in the senile desire to escape responsibility we throw that responsibility upon the committee.

In these days of great excitement it is easy to rise and say majestically, "I stand for virtue, for patriotism, and for economy." Who does not? Who, indeed, does not stand for these? That does not reduce appropriations. Nobody here is better posted on appropriations than the Senator from Tennessee. If the Senator believes an appropriation is unjust and is excessive, let him say so and not dodge the responsibility by sending the item to the committee. I can point out an item or two in this bill that is excessive, but I shall not resort to the expedient of asking somebody else to make the computations for me, or send the bill back to the committee and request it to make the deductions.

So, whilst the Senator from Wisconsin and I did not vote alike the other day, I am glad to see that now, with his pungent intellect, he perceives that it is utterly fantastic to talk about sending the bill back there for the committee to take a pair of shears and shear off 10 per cent. Oh, how easy it would be for us all if we could rescue from oblivion the old Procrustean bed of fixity and, when a man was not long enough, stretch him out; or, if he was too long, cut off his head or his feet! How easy would be the task of legislators!

I think we should proceed with this bill or any other bill in the usual way. If an item is 10 cents too much, cut it off; eliminate it. If it is not enough, increase it. But while I am reluctant to set my judgment on matters of appropriation against that of the senior Senator from Tennessee, I nevertheless stand my ground and prophesy-which is a rare thing for me to do and a dangerous thing for anyone to do-that we will not economize, we will not get anywhere, by transferring the responsibility of reductions from ourselves to the committee. It was not fair to the committee. It was not dealing with them in the way that men ought to deal with each other.

If the Senator from Tennessee thinks any item ought to be reduced, let him say so. Where is the amendment?

Where is the item that should be reduced? Is he, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, going to vote to reduce the appropriations to enforce prohibition? I am not. Is he?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed I am not.

Mr. ASHURST. Why, of course not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me interrupt for just a moment.

The Senator has asked why we did not reduce the various items in the bill. If the Senator was here when the agricultural bill was before the Senate-and I think he was-

Mr. ASHURST. The Interior bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the agricultural bill-he will remember that I followed the plan that he is now suggesting. I offered 29 distinct amendments both to abolish and afterward to reduce the appropriations in each one of those 29 particulars; and the Senate, by an average vote of about 45 to 20, voted down every one of them. When the motion was made in the case of the next bill that came up, however, to recommit it to the Appropriations Committee, with instructions to reduce the total 10 per cent, it carried by a vote of 40 to 25.

Mr. ASHURST. Then we are in this situation: The appropriations for the Agricultural Department have not been reduced a flat 10 per cent; but the appropriations for the Interior Department-which is the people's department, or the social-service department, the department more closely concerned with the people of this country than almost any other department-are to be reduced. When we begin to talk about an appropriation that may be of some benefit to the home, the farm, the field, the workshop, that is reduced. Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it that the Senate will apply the same rule to each department, and while it is a little more difficult to apply it to the Department of Agriculture, I think the Senator can be absolutely assured that if it is applied to the other departments it will be applied to that department, though it will be applied later.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. I will comment on what the Senator from Arizona has just referred to, the sending of the Interior Department appropriation bill back to the Appropriations Committee. The Interior Department appropriation bill deals almost entirely with a few of the Western States. The East is not as interested as the people from the Western States are in this bill. Therefore, I think it is highly unfair that that bill be referred back, as it has been.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that he will have an opportunity to vote for a reduction in appropriations in connection with each one of the appropriation bills, regardless of whether it more particularly applies to one part of the country than to another. We are going to play no favorites.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have no right to do so. and I am not drawing any strictures upon the esteemed Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Tennessee was not sitting with the Committee on Appropriations for some days, suffering from a very sad bereavement, in which the entire Senate grieved with him. I am not at all charging him with any dereliction with respect to these appropriations. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but, I repeat, that I could scarcely believe my own ears when it was proposed that, without regard to the justice or propriety thereof, these Interior Department items be reduced 10 per cent, forgetting that many of them were fixed charges, the contracts were let, and that it was the acme of ridiculousness to reduce them a flat 10 per cent.

Oh, how easy it would be to remove the depression if we could just cancel our debts or our commitments 10 per cent. That is no more ridiculous than the proposition to reduce all these appropriations 10 per cent or to increase all of them 10 per cent, whereas some items should be reduced 50 per cent, some should be eliminated, and some should be increased 15 or 20 per cent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from | Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will touch on the prohibition matter very carefully, because if we are to eliminate this appropriation of $10,000,000, does not the Senator know that crime will break out in the country; that bootleggers will immediately begin to ply their trade; that people will be in a position to buy this outlawed product?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator need talk about liquor. Liquor is not good for an empty stomach, and that is what the American people have now. Let us not talk about liquor on an empty stomach.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I just want to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that liquor, of course, is not the question under debate. What is under debate, or what will be under debate, is whether or not we want to expend $11,000,000 in a futile attempt to enforce a foolish law. That is what will be involved in the debate when we arrive at that stage in the bill. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I wanted to ask was this: If I recall aright, the other day when a motion was made to recommit the Interior Department appropriation bill, directing a 10 per cent reduction, the Senator from Arizona voted against it, did he not?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I did.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if I may proceed now-

Mr. ASHURST. I have too long trespassed on the courtesy of the Senator from Wisconsin, but let me suggest this for example: On page 62 of the bill we come to the question of appropriations for promoting commerce in Europe and "other areas"—that is to say, such part of the world as is not embraced in Europe—$828,000; for the promotion of commerce in Latin America, $456,000; and so on and so forth. I think Senators may very properly ask for a justification of those items, and there may arise some debate as to whether or not they could stand a cut of 10 per cent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona ought to realize that there is a $17,000,000 Department of Commerce Building up on Pennsylvania Avenue, with something like 52 or 53 acres of floor space, and a private elevator for the Secretary of Commerce. All of those things are going to cost money. It will cost money to keep the brass knobs properly polished and other things in nice shape. So that it will take a lot of this $800,000, or whatever the amount is, to maintain that building. I want the Senator to realize that before he begins to talk about economy in connection with the Commerce Department. He should not overlook the trifling sum of $800,000. A good big chunk could be lopped off in many such sums.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. There is in the world, and has been for a century or more, a class of learned men who have discussed the question, Where is the best place for a boil on the human body? But mankind is agreed that the place for a boil is on the back of the neck—of the other fellow. [Laughter.] The Senate and all legislative bodies seem to agree that economy is something to be practiced by the other fellow, not by ourselves.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope the Senator will be very careful in suggesting that the prohibition appropriation be curtailed for another reason. As I understand it, the Federal Government now is asking for an appropriation of approximately $5,000,000 for a new Federal prison. Does not the Senator realize that if he could be the means of cutting any of this money off, perhaps that many less people would be arrested for violation of the prohibition laws? Then the Government would be in the ridiculous position of having a beautiful $5,000,000 prison with nobody to put into it, and such inefficiency should not be tolerated by any legislative body. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, we will get to the prohibition provision after a while. The appropriation proposed in this bill is over $11,000,000. That is more than twice as much as the Senator from Tennessee expects to save by a 10 per cent reduction in the Interior Department appropriation bill. One item alone is more than twice as much as the entire proposed 10 per cent reduction in the Interior Department appropriation bill amounts to. So it is an important question, from the standpoint of economy, and from the standpoint of balancing the Budget, and from the standpoint of preserving the financial integrity and solvency of the United States.

Mr. President, we will undertake to discuss that when we offer an amendment to strike out that enormous appropriation for the perfectly silly operation of undertaking to enforce the Volstead Act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the Senator talks about the small amount which will be saved if this bill is reduced 10 per cent under what the House provided. The House voted in this bill—

House provided. The House voted in this bill—
Mr. BLAINE. To which bill is the Senator referring?
Mr. McKELLAR. I am talking about the bill under discussion.

Mr. BLAINE. I mentioned especially the amount authorized for the enforcement of prohibition alone.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just going to say that the entire bill as it came from the House provided for an appropriation of $124,215,000, and therefore the saving, under the 10 per cent provision, would amount to $12,400,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I am going to ask the Senator from Tennessee and other Senators to join with us in reducing that by $11,000,000 more by cutting out the amount suggested for prohibition enforcement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that will have to be taken up before the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. That will make a saving of $23,000,000—enough to cover a very large part of the sales tax which some are proposing to put upon the backs of the hungry.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, we could effect real economy if we could cut out the whole appropriation for the enforcement of prohibition, because the Attorney General says that over half of the present cases are directly attributable to prohibition. Therefore if the Senator from Wisconsin could save to the taxpayers this much money, he would effect a double saving, because then the new prison would not be necessary, and the addition of the $5,000,000 would make $16,000,000 of saving, and that much money would not have to be raised through a sales tax.

The Senator must realize, however, that we can not economize when it comes to prohibition, because already that is one of the major factors in the expenses of the Government. If we did away with that, the body at the other end of the Capitol would have nothing to talk about. There would be no sales-tax proposal. The Senator is only nibbling at the bud, because the minute prohibition is repealed the sales tax will not be necessary, nor will an increase in estate taxes be necessary, because in that one matter alone enough money will be saved to provide for the needs of the Government and balance the Budget.

Mr. BLAINE. I am quite in accord with the Senator from Maryland. But, of course, we are confronted with this situation. We have this appropriation bill before us now. We can not amend the appropriation bill to levy excise taxes. We must settle each one of these problems as it comes before the Senate. I submit that if $11,000,000 is cut out of this bill, we will have taken a pretty long step toward eliminating one of the sources of tremendous waste and extravagance in the conduct of our Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if he believes that expenditures of the Government are extravagant and ought to be reduced, and will vote for the motion which I am going to make in connection with each of the appropriation bills, to reduce it 10 per cent, I think he will find that that will go a long way toward economy, and will save the Government and the taxpayers an enormous amount of money.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I voted with the Senator the other day on the 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am happy the Senator did, and I hope he will vote for the motion I shall make a little later in connection with the pending bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I voted with the Senator on the only motion he has made to recommit. But I want to reduce these items before we approach that motion, and if we can cut out several million dollars of appropriations for purely useless, wasteful purposes, we will save considerably more than the Senator can hope to save through his 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. President, I confess very frankly that the three amendments which have been adopted by the Senate refer to subjects about which I have no definite or specific information. I am not on the Committee on Appropriations, and I am not on any committee which has to do with the general subject, reference to which has been made in the three appropriation items. Therefore I must ask the Senator from Washington to give me some information.

I may desire to make a motion. I do not want to make that motion unless there is justification for it. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington about the item under "Emergencies Arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service," pages 11 and 12. What unforeseen emergency could arise and what is the purpose of extending the commercial and other interests of the United States in foreign parts under the present situation of the world economic condition that would justify an increase of 50 per cent in the amount carried in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. JONES. I wish to say to the Senator that we have not approved all that was estimated for by the Budget, which estimate was based very largely upon our experience during the last five or six years. Since 1926 there has been no time when the amount was less than $230,000 a year, and there have been three years since 1926 when the amount necessary to meet conditions under the act amounted to over $300,000. The Budget estimate was $400,000. In considering the facts and the experience we have had since 1926, the committee felt hardly justified in granting the $400,000, but we did feel wholly justified in granting $300,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the committee take into consideration the fact that our foreign commerce has been greatly reduced, and in all probability will continue to recede in the years to come under present world economic conditions and the high tariff walls that have been erected here and abroad?

Mr. JONES. Of course, we might differ as to the effect of the high tariff walls, and so on, but that condition of things was taken into consideration by the committee and that was one reason why we did not grant the Budget estimate of $400,000. I think the committee was influenced more by the actual experience of the Government since 1926. There were only three years, I believe, when the amount was some $230,000 and three years when it was over $300,000, so we concluded $200,000 was a little bit small based upon the actual practical experience of the country during the last six or seven years, and we made it $300,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Would it not have been perfectly safe, on account of the gradual reduction in our foreign commerce, to have adopted the amount provided for by the House?

Mr. JONES. I have really stated to the Senator the reasons why the committee made it $300,000. We know that during the last six years there has been no year when it was less than $232,000. We know that in three years it went over $300,000. Those are the facts which led us to decide on $300,000. The Senate has the information we had, in view of what I have stated with reference to the actual expenditures that we have been called on to make since 1926.

If the Senate thinks the committee has been too cautious under the present condition of things, of course, they will reduce the amount. We think that the facts—not theories, but the facts—and the experience of the Government since 1926 fully justify not only cutting the amount down from $400,000, but in placing it at $300,000 instead of $200,000.

Mr. BLAINE. The second and third amendments are on page 12, one increasing a House appropriation 100 per cent for post allowances in foreign service, and the other item for representation allowances increased by about 300 per cent. I assume they relate to similar matters?

Mr. JONES. In a way they are similar matters, but there are various points where heretofore there has been a small allowance distributed to the minister or to the representative of this Government to help in defraying his expenses. The Budget estimate was $100,000. That amount has been distributed to the various points to help make up the compensation of our representatives there because of the various conditions which confront them, the changes of raiment they have to have on account of climatic conditions and the fact that they are moved from one place to another. They do not know what time they will be moved from a warm climate to a cold climate or from a cold climate to a warm climate. The department can make allowance for those things. We felt that in the distribution all over the world $100,000 was not at all too much. It does not at all defray the expenses to which these representatives of our Government are subjected, even above the amount of the salaries paid to them.

Mr. BLAINE. I presume the committee knew that former Secretary Mellon had been appointed to the Court of St. James. Is some of this allowance going to help him out in changing his raiment?

Mr. JONES. No; none of this will go to him.

Mr. BLAINE. It goes only to the poor?

Mr. JONES. It goes to our representatives abroad who really need something to supplement the salaries that are paid them.

Mr. BLAINE. The representation allowance, I presume, is for entertainment?

Mr. JONES. That is the fact. The Budget estimate was $125,000. The House cut it to $100,000. I care nothing about the entertainment so far as I am personally concerned, but I know that our representatives abroad have to do some things there that they would not have to do at home.

Possibly the standing of our country abroad in many different places is affected more or less by the sort of entertainment that our representatives offer. I have never been abroad. I do not know anything about it personally. I have heard some of our representatives, some Members of the Senate who have represented the National Government abroad, tell of entertainment which they had to furnish, and because they were unable to pay for it out of funds allowed by the Government for that purpose, they had to pay the expense out of their own pockets. This was done in order to maintain the standing of our country abroad. While I feel that our representatives really needed the $125,000, yet we did not grant it. We gave only $100,000. We felt that this was only partial justice to our representatives abroad.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his explanation. Under ordinary circumstances, if the United States Treasury was overflowing with revenue and a surplus of money, then it might be all right to talk about maintaining certain standards on the part of our foreign representatives; it might be all right then to talk about giving them larger funds for the purpose of entertaining their friends and themselves and their relatives when they happened to be abroad visiting the various diplomats. But under the present conditions prevailing in the United States, the standard of living of several million people has been reduced almost to zero. They have not a dollar with which to buy essential food and clothing.

The thing that surprises me is that the Senate could spend about two weeks debating about a few thousand dollars intended to be used to destroy the pest which destroys the farmers' crops, and then in the adoption of these three amendments spend only a little over three seconds per item in increasing appropriations 50 per cent in one case, 100 per cent in another case, and 300 per cent in another case.

I know we are not going to effect great economies by this method, and yet these are no doubt matters which can await a more prosperous day before we begin to expend additional sums for the purposes defined by the Senator from Washington. Therefore, in view of the situation and in view of the attitude of the Senate on the Interior Department appropriation bill, it seems to me the votes by which the three amendments on page 12 were agreed to should be reconsidered, and I ask unanimous consent that they be reconsidered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES. Under the circumstances and because of the reasons on which the Senator bases his request, I feel that I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator object because I ask that they be reconsidered en bloc?

Mr. JONES. No. I really object because the Senator bases his request on the action of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; I am not basing my objection at all upon that condition. I want now to say, not by way of apology but by way of explanation, that when I referred to the Senator from Tennessee I think I did point out, at least I intended to do so, that he was entirely sincere and honest. He had a proper motive in mind when he made his contest on the Interior Department appropriation bill. am not criticizing him for it at all. I would imply no criticism whatever. I do not, in what I have said this afternoon, imply any criticism of any action upon the part of any Senator respecting these appropriations.

However, I was pointing out that it is a strange spectacle to me, and I think it will be a strange spectacle to the country, that we should spend two weeks here debating the Interior Department appropriation bill, largely a debate over two or three small items, but when this bill is before the Senate in a few seconds we increase the appropriations over the amount fixed by the House far in excess of the specific items that were attacked in the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. I did not mean to imply that the Senator criticized the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Tennessee shakes his head in disapproval. I want to complete my statement. The increase in the bill before us in the three items is many times the increase in the two specific items to which I have heretofore referred in the Interior Department appropriation bill, one relating to barberry eradication and the other to furnishing certain agricultural service to the Indians.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. A while ago I explained to the Senator and the Senate that long ago I would have made a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, but that I had understood that the Vice President had held that such a motion could not be made until just before the third reading of the bill.

I find upon inquiry that I wholly misunderstood the ruling of the Vice President, and that the motion is permissible at any time. I would be glad to make the motion now, but we consider committee amendments. In view of that situation, there is no reason to bother about the amendments, because if the motion to recommit the bill with directions to reduce the amount 10 per cent should be agreed to, as I hope it will, it will probably change all the amendments anyway.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Wisconsin has the right, no matter upon which side he voted, to move to reconsider at any time within a certain number of days. I wish to say that there is no Senator here whose devotion to the general public is more assiduous and disinterested than that of the Senator from Tennessee: I have followed and shall continue to follow his lead with respect to economy; but, lest it might appear that I had a more or less cynical view of economy, I wish it distinctly understood that I sympathize with all sensible and practical moves toward reducing the expenses of the Government, which have quintupled in my day and generation.

What I fear is that under the guidance and leadership of the Senator from Tennessee I shall be led into a position where I shall not get any economy or any reduced appropriations, and, with all emphasis, I wish to say that I hope the able Senator will take up these items seriatum as we come to them, point out, if he is able to do so, where there is an inadequate appropriation and where there is one that is swollen to a degree beyond that which it should be.

I again say that I am sure we shall get nowhere by recommitting the bill to the committee with instructions to reduce it a flat 10 per cent. Let us see what would result. I call attention to an item that we have not yet reached on page 44 of the bill which deals with the expenses of circuit courts. I believe there are 44 judges of circuit courts of the United States, which are the intermediate courts between the district courts and the Supreme Court of the United States. The bill provides, on page 44, line 19:

That the maximum salary paid to any law clerk to any circuit judge shall not exceed $2,400 per annum.

Mr. President, I have never been on the circuit bench, but the lawyers here will bear me out in the statement that it is absurd to talk about paying a salary of $2,400 a year to the law clerk to a circuit judge. The business of the circuit courts has expanded enormously during the past 10 years. It is the business of the circuit courts, and I believe they have applied themselves to it, to weed out in every proper way, where they may legally and constitutionally do so, certain cases and thereby relieve the Supreme Court from congestion. Suffice it to say that I doubt if there are in the United States to-day officials who work with more assiduity and more zeal than do the circuit judges.

The law clerk of a circuit judge ought to be a man comparable in intellect, comparable in character, comparable in zeal and learning at least to a clerk of a United States Senator. If the philosophy of the learned Senator from Tennessee should prevail, the salaries of law clerks of the circuit judges, which are limited in this bill to $2,400 a year, would be reduced 10 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator from Arizona wholly misconstrues the purpose of the motion. It is not to reduce such salaries. For instance, I have no idea that the salaries of the circuit judges will be attempted to be interfered with.

Mr. ASHURST. But the salaries of the law clerks will be. Mr. McKELLAR. Or the salaries of the law clerks. The committee has full authority and power to change some appropriations, to leave others just as they are, and even to raise other appropriations if in its judgment it thinks it proper to do so. The motion, if agreed to, will not interfere with that power of the committee at all.

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator from Tennessee, as to 27 or 28 items in the Interior Department appropriation bill. asked for reductions; I think I voted with him on a majority of them, and he may think that he should have triumphed, are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement to but he did not. Now when the Senate does not agree with him, he asks the Committee on Appropriations to be the tribunal which will overrule the Senate. When the Senate committee brings the bill back with a reduction of 10 per cent, doubtless the then majority of 2 to 1 that voted against the Senator's reduction will hold the same view; so that we will be going around in a circle.

Mr. President, taking the particular items under consideration, I believe that I ought to and I shall vote against the amendment found on line 3, page 12, where the Senator from Wisconsin points out there is an increase of 50 per cent. On line 14 there is an increase of 100 per cent and on line 24 an increase of 300 per cent. These increases—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment. Should be discussed each on its merits, and each one voted up or down upon its merits and not dumped over en bloc to the committee to make the 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield, of course he has a right to do that; he may call for a vote on every one of these amendments; there is no reason in the world why he should not; but I merely want to call his attention to a mistake he has made.

For a number of years, I think for the last five years at least, Congress has been appropriating $400,000 a year for a fund which is known as an entertainment fund. I do not think such a fund ought to be provided at all. I am one of those who believe that entertainments ought to be paid for by the officials who give the entertainments, and that the Government ought not to pay for any official's entertainment. I do not think it is a proper, and I never have thought it was a proper, item to be charged against the Government.

For the last five years, to my certain knowledge, as I have just looked at the figures, Congress has been allowing $400,000 a year for this purpose. In the pending bill the House cut the amount down to $200,000; the Senate committee has restored one-half of the remainder, and recommends an appropriation of $300,000, instead of $400,000 which was appropriated last year. For my part, if the motion which I expect to make to recommit the bill to the Appropriations Committee shall be adopted, I am going to take the same position which I have always taken regarding this item. It ought to be stricken out entirely; no amount should be appropriated for the purpose specified, and, especially at a time when our Government is over $2,000,000,000 in the hole, we ought not to be appropriating the enormous sum of $400,000 to allow our diplomats to wine and dine people, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President-

Mr. JONES. I should like to correct a statement which has been made.

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield in just a moment. When the bill before us was taken up, as I recall, the first amendment occurred on page 6, a very informal and inconsequential amendment. The clerk is a very efficient clerk, a very excellent clerk, and of course, in the exercise of his splendid efficiency, he turned immediately to page 12, as I recall, stated that the next amendment was on line 3 on that page to strike out $200,000 and insert $300,000, and the Chair immediately announced that, without objection, the amendment was agreed to.

At the rate of speed with which the proceedings were being conducted it was practically impossible for a Member of the Senate to have thumbed the pages from 6 to 12 in the time taken to state the amendment and adopt it. As a matter of fact, exercising as great speed as I could, I did not reach page 12 until the third amendment on that page had been stated. There are three amendments on that page, making an aggregate increase in three appropriations of $225,000, and almost as quickly as one could snap his finger they were agreed to. I think in all fairness the Senate ought to have an opportunity to pass on those increases, and for that reason I asked unanimous consent to have the vote by which the amendments were agreed to reconsidered. That unanimous consent having been denied, I now move that the vote by which the amendment on page 12, line 3, was adopted may be reconsidered, and I shall then make the same motion respecting the other two amendments on that page.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to express to my friend from Washington [Mr. Jones], the chairman of the committee, the hope that he will consent, without action on the motion, to the unanimous consent which I ask that the votes by which the amendments in line 3, line 14, and line 24, on page 12, were agreed to may be reconsidered. I hope the Senator will not object to that.

Mr. JONES. I want to say that I rose to suggest that very thing. Under the circumstances I am willing to do that for the Senator from Wisconsin, although it does seem to me that he deliberately allowed these amendments to be adopted. I will admit, however, that we went through them very speedily as we sometimes do.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator will have to eliminate the word "deliberately."

Mr. JONES. I will withdraw that word.

Mr. BLAINE. There was not very much deliberation in regard to the amendments.

Mr. JONES. That is the reason I said they went through very fast. I know there was not any deliberation, but I thought they were allowed to go as fast as they did go without objection.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion. I understand the Senator from Tennessee, regardless of the outcome of the consideration of this bill, regardless of the action which may be taken on the amendments, proposes to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it back with a reduction of 10 per cent below the amount carried by the bill as passed by the House.

I do not think that the unanimous-consent agreement to consider committee amendments before other amendments precludes such a motion being made at any time, and, if the Senator is going to make such a motion, I should like to have him make the motion now and let the Senate not waste its time considering the various amendments to the bill and then have them all stricken out and the appropriations cut 10 per cent below the amount provided in the House bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, after the request for unanimous consent shall have been granted and the amendments referred to have been reconsidered, then, as soon as I can get the floor, in view of the Senator's statement as to the parliamentary situation, I shall be very happy to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw my objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, unanimous consent was granted first to consider committee amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that is what I understood.

Mr. McNARY. And acting under that unanimous-consent agreement, the Senate proceeded to consider the committee amendments. That agreement can not now be altered other than by unanimous consent.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was my idea, but the Senator from Washington stated that he thought it would be in order to make the motion to recommit at any time.

Mr. McNARY. I do not entertain that view at all. I am addressing myself to the question of procedure. Unanimous consent was given to pursue a particular course, which was to consider committee amendments to the bill. That agreement can be modified only by similar action, namely, by unanimous consent. After that shall have been done and the committee amendments shall have been considered it will be timely, prudent, and proper for the Senator from Tennessee to make his motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I make the motion and it is objected to, then I will ask unanimous consent, and then, if that is objected to, I will have to wait, I imagine, until after the consideration of the bill shall have been concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Senator from Tennessee is.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is to reconsider the votes by which the three amendments on page 12 were adopted, so that the Senator from Wisconsin may have a vote on each one.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to a reconsideration of the votes whereby the amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington object?

Mr. JONES. No; I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection. The Chair understands the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw his formal motion to reconsider.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the votes where the amendments were agreed to are reconsidered. The clerk will state the first amendment on page 12.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, at the end of line 3, it is proposed to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$300,000."

Mr. BLAINE. During the discussion of this amendment, particularly the discussion relating to what the amendment covers, there has been only a handful of Senators on the floor. I doubt if 8 or 10 or 12 Senators should legislate $225,000 in or out without some fair representation on the floor. I, therefore, suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst Dale Robinson, Ind. Austin Davis Kean Schall Bailey Bankhead Dickinson Dill Sheppard Shipstead Kendrick Keyes Fess Fletcher King Shortridge Barbour Logan Smith Barkley Bingham Black Frazier Long Smoot McGill George Steiwer McKellar Thomas, Idaho Thomas, Okla. Townsend Blaine Glass Glenn McNary Metcalf Goldsborough Bratton Broussard Bulkley Gore Morrison Trammell Moses Hale Tydings Vandenberg Harrison Neely Bulow Hastings Norbeck Byrnes Capper Caraway Hatfield Walcott Norris Hawes Hayden Nye Oddie Walsh, Mass. Waterman Carev Coolidge Hebert Patterson Watson Wheeler Copeland Howell Pittman Costigan Hull Reed White Robinson, Ark. Johnson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee announces that he proposes to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to strike out 10 per cent of the amount carried by the bill as it passed the House.

It seems to some of us that it is useless for us to take the time and effort to go clear through this bill if at the end of that time we are to have our work all undone and thrown away, and the bill is to be sent back to the committee with instructions to report the bill with the amount reduced 10 per cent below the total appropriated by the House. So I am perfectly willing to have that motion voted upon at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the following motion:

I move that the pending bill, H. R. 9349, making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the Senate with amendments providing an aggregate reduction of 10 per cent in the amount of the appropriations contained in the bill as received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I am going to take just a moment of the Senate's time to give the reasons for that motion.

If Senators will turn to page 2 of the bill, they will find that it is proposed to appropriate $1,915,540 for the office of the Secretary of State. I find that in 1928 we appropriated for that office $1,089,000; in 1929, $1,045,000; even as late as 1930 we appropriated $1,340,000; and now, for the fiscal

Mr. McNARY. I do not know what the request of the | year 1933, the appropriation is jumped up to $1,915,000. In other words, these appropriations have almost doubled in the period of five years, and they have doubled at a time when they should not have doubled, because, as everybody knows, the country is in a very different condition than it was five years ago.

> Then if Senators will turn to page 4, they will find there an appropriation for contingent expenses of $101,000. In 1928 this appropriation was $43,000; so that in the five years it has more than doubled.

> The next item, printing and binding, was $190,000. It is increased to $258,000, as will be seen there.

> As to passport agencies, the increase was not so great. Five years ago the appropriation was $63,000. Now it is only $77,000.

> On page 5 practically the same thing is shown, but on the next page I call especial attention to the item of "salaries of clerks in the Foreign Service." Five years ago that appropriation was $1,400,000; the next year, $1,462,000; the next year, $1,692,000; the next year, $2,364,000; the next year, $2,502,000; and this year it is about the same.

> I turn now to page 8. The first item is for $847,000. next two items are merely unobligated balances, which are reappropriated. I doubt whether anything should be reappropriated. The unobligated balances should be paid to the Treasury. But that is another matter.

> I next come to an appropriation for contingent expenses— United States consulates. That is found on pages 8, 9, and 10, but the full amount of the appropriation, $815,000, is stated on page 10.

> Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that all of these items he is now reading in respect to the Consular Service are, to a large degree, duplicated in the back of the bill, under the independent foreign service, which is operated in the Department of Com-

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I take the liberty of suggesting to the Senator that if we were bent in a practical fashion upon reaching economies in the operation of the Government, the prime method of doing it in respect to this particular bill would be to clothe somebody with authority to redistribute and consolidate these bureaus so that we could get economy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, Mr. President; I think the Senator from Michigan is right in his statement. Even larger savings could be secured. But unquestionably there would not be the slightest difficulty, if this bill were recommitted, in effecting a saving of 10 per cent, without injuring the service in the slightest, and the items I have mentioned I think amply sustain that view. In other words, in the State Department, just as in all the other departments, in five years these increases in appropriations of somewhere between 75 and 100 per cent for doing substantially the same work have been made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to three items on page 12, as to which I understand the votes were reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I was called out of the Chamber, and was not here when that was done. One of those is on line 3, one on line 14, and one on line 24. What are those items

Mr. McKELLAR. In the first item the House appropriated $200,000, but the Senate committee raised it to $300,000. That is an item in which $400,000 has been allowed for the last five years. It is for entertaining.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken about that; $125,000 is for entertainment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Four hundred thousand dollars has been allowed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, which item includes the change in raiment which seems to be essential for these diplomats?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there is no change in raiment, so far as I know, provided for in this; but perhaps the chairman of the committee can enlighten us about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there ought to be a change | ning. I was going to suggest that the motion be considered of raiment. We can not expect these fellows to wear the same clothes for four or five years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think there ought to be an addition for knee breeches?

Mr. NORRIS. There ought to be some new knee breeches. This has been going on for so long that they are worn out.

Mr. JONES. I suggest to the Senator that this does not apply to activities in this country, and it is not brought about by customs which I would follow myself. This matter of change of raiment really comes under the post allowances, as to which we have raised $50,000 to $100,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is what the Senator is referring to. I am going to vote against the $50,000 increase. If it is allowed, it will be to enable Mr. Mellon to have knee

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the chairman of the committee what the $300,000 is for?

Mr. JONES. It is for carrying out neutrality laws and things of that kind. The Budget estimate was for $400,000. Mr. NORRIS. Just what is it for?

Mr. JONES. There are different controversies. There has been no year when the expenditures for this purpose have been less than $230,000 a year, and there have been three years when they were over $300,000 a year, for carrying out the neutrality laws. Mr. NORRIS. That is under the head of Consular Service?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that money expended here in Washington or in foreign countries?

Mr. JONES. That, I think, is expended largely in foreign

Mr. McKELLAR. It is Diplomatic and Foreign Service. That expenditure is for entertainment also.

Mr. JONES. That is not used by any of the departments for entertaining purposes at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. The department has a right to direct that it be so used, I am quite sure.

Mr. JONES. The $100,000 at the bottom of page 12 is for entertainment purposes. There is no question about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The other can be used for that purpose. Mr. JONES. I can not think so. I do not think there is any law which would allow that money to be used for that

Mr. NORRIS. How about the amendment on line 14? Mr. JONES. That is for changes of various kinds allowed to various officers.

Mr. NORRIS. For what?

Mr. JONES. It really supplements the compensation allowed to some of the officers at various places. For instance, a man may be in a torrid zone and be transferred in winter to a northern zone, where it is cold; or there may be some such change as that. Of course, that entails different raiment, different methods of living, and so on. They make some allowances for those purposes. There is no specific amount, but that just illustrates what is done. It is really a supplement to the compensation paid to men in positions where they get very small compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think that is about all I desire to say. I think the motion should be submitted to the Senate at this time, and I hope we may have a vote on it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I understand, we are now proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion before the Senate is to recommit the bill, a motion offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is it the desire of the Senator from Tennessee to press his motion to-morrow morning? Mr. McKELLAR. If we have a quorum, I see no reason why we should not vote on the motion now.

Mr. McNARY. It is a very important matter, and Senators did not know it would be brought to a vote this eve-as pending, and that we take a recess now until to-morrow.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to enter my objection to the motion, on the ground that we are acting under a unanimousconsent agreement to consider committee amendments, and it seems that a motion such as that the Senator from Tennessee has made can not be in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin suggest that as a point of order?

Mr. BLAINE. I make that as a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate now take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 22, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 21, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we praise Thee for a continuance of Thy merciful goodness, utterly marvelous, miraculous, and strange. It supplies a hope very dear and precious—a hope that looks forward into the distant ages of God; let its hymn be sung in all our hearts; cleanse Thou us from secret faults. May we not soil the page of life with thoughtless, heedless, sinful fingerprints. Each day may there be in us the process of the formation of habits of mind, of character, and of life that shall carry us forward into those regions where goodness inspires every faculty of our being. Heavenly Father, quiet fretful voices and irritations and ease the minds of care. Help to have conquest over unwise propensities and let justice and wisdom dictate all conclusions. Gracious Lord, guide us through these troublesome times. May the good of country be our whole mission and a restful conscience the reward of our toil. Through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 19, 1932, was read and approved.

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in order to make an announcement. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I prepared and published in my remarks some tables showing the distribution of the manufacturers' sales tax among the several States, using as the basis of such distribution the value of such products in each State in comparison with the total for the Nation. Comparison was also shown between the present system of internal-revenue taxation and the manufacturers' sales tax, if the latter should be substituted entirely for the present system. Several Members have suggested that it would be very helpful and informative if a table were prepared showing a comparison in the distribution of the taxation upon incomes and corporations alone in contrast to that under a manufacturers' sales tax. I have prepared such a table and under general leave to extend already granted will insert the same at this point. I hope it will be interesting and helpful in the consideration of this important subject.

Mr. Speaker, when the House of Representatives shows such a determination to reject a major recommendation of one of its leading committees, all but unanimously reported, as has been witnessed in the past few days in the storm of opposition to the manufacturers' sales tax, it is a fair assumption that there must be sound reasons for the determined opposition. Many of these reasons have been presented clearly and vigorously. Individual and corporate income and profits have heretofore been the principal source of Federal taxation. Ability to pay has been the standard of assessment. The manufacturers' sales tax sets up a new policy. Production rather than profits is the new base upon which this tax is to be levied. If the tax is passed on it becomes a consumption tax, and the big manufacturers will be best able to pass it on, thus introducing a new and harmful element of competition.

With entire frankness some Members have admitted that the term "manufacturers' sales tax" is a misnomer and that for the most part the tax imposed will be passed on. One committee member frankly stated that such was the purpose of the plan.

To anyone who has not completely lost all conception of the terrific burden of local taxation the people of the country are now bearing, even the possibility of adding thereto by a Federal tax levy on consumption is unthinkable. Much has been heard about increasing Federal taxation until it approaches "a capital levy." Local taxes paid by farmers and small home owners have been "capital levies" in a very high percentage of cases this past year, and in fact in recent years. The average in Michigan is $32.37 per $1,000 valuation. These taxes support local government and local and State institutions, and constitute a far heavier relative burden than the Federal income-tax payer carries. Not another penny should be imposed on such taxpayers under this proposed sales tax.

Considerable emphasis has been put on the attempt to shift the burden of income and corporation taxes to this new base of sales or consumption tax. The chief newspaper propagandist for a sales tax openly urges such a shift. In the tables I inserted in my remarks on page 6073 I showed what a shift from the total internal revenue to a sales-tax base would mean to each State.

Internal-revenue collections include levies upon tobacco, narcotics, theaters, and so forth, in addition to income and corporation taxes. The tables I present to-day compare the distribution of $500,000,000 of Federal taxes among the States under the present income and corporation plan with that of the sales-tax plan. I am hopeful that members will note the comparison with interest.

The income and corporation data is from pages 60 and 61 of the Report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1931, House Document No. 11, and the data on manufacturing is from the Bureau of the Census for the census of 1921.

It will be noted that under the manufacturers' sales tax plan eight States and the District of Columbia pay less than they would under the income and corporation plans. Delaware and New York would enjoy the chief advantage. Delaware would shift $7,800,000 and New York $95,250,000 to 40 other States. Ohio would pay $17,200,000 more, Indiana follows with $12,400,000 more, New Jersey $8,750,000 more, Wisconsin $7,900,000 more.

Your special attention is invited to New York. It will be noted that she pays 33 per cent plus of the income and corporation taxes of the country. She would pay 14 per cent of the manufacturers' sales tax. In money she pays $165,-250,000 of each $500,000,000 income and corporation taxes of the country. She would pay $70,000,000 of each $500,000,000 of sales tax. Naturally every New Yorker might be expected to shout for the sales tax. Up-State New Yorkers should take a second look, however. Greater New York City pays 88.2 per cent and up-State 11.8 per cent of the whole State's share of Federal income and corporation taxes.

In money this division is $145,750,500 paid by Greater New York and $19,499,500 by up-State under the present plan. Turning now to the sales-tax plan, Greater New York City has 60 per cent of the value of all manufactured products of the State and up-State 40 per cent. Dividing the $70,000,000 on this basis, gives $42,000,000 to Greater New York and $28,000,000 up-State. If the $70,000,000 were divided between city and up-State by the income and corporation plan, or on the basis of 88.2 per cent and 11.8 per cent, the result would be $61,740,000 to the city and $8,260,000 up-State.

Summarizing, then, Greater New York City pays $145,-750,500 of the whole State's $165,250,000 of each $500,000,000 Federal income and corporation tax. Under the proposed sales-tax plan she would pay $42,000,000 and shift $84,-010,500 to the country at large and $19,740,000 to up-State New York. That is a total shift of $103,750,500.

Contemplating these figures might one not fairly say that they afford some explanation of the unusual interest of William Randolph Hearst and his large New York City interests in the proposed sales-tax plan!

Your particular attention is called to the shift of $19,-740,000 or 13.6 per cent from Greater New York City to up-State under the proposed sales-tax plan. It is worthy of special note by Representatives of other States having large cities. It is my belief that similar situations would be found.

Other interesting comparisons will be suggested by the tables. Note Delaware particularly. Under the present income and corporation tax plan she pays $8,850,000 of each $500,000,000 collected. Under the proposed sales-tax plan she would pay $1,050,000, or $7,800,000 less. One can easily understand the special interest in that State in the proposed sales-tax plan or other plan to shift Federal income and corporation taxes.

I am aware that it will be argued that the income and corporation tax payers of Delaware and New York are to have their increases under this bill. Conceded. But so are the income-tax payers of the 40 States to whom the shift described above is being made. By what logic should New Jersey take on $5,750,000 of the burden of New York, or Tennessee bear an extra $2,950,000?

These tables and comments have been submitted in an earnest effort to defeat the proposed sales-tax plan. Patriotism has been frequently invoked during the last few days. I fail to see its application to the present situation, so far as the merits of the sales tax are concerned. We must reduce expenses and impose taxes temporarily. But a general sales tax such as proposed should be stricken from this bill and forgotten as a Federal tax policy.

DR. RICHARD BARTHOLDT

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Richard Bartholdt, who served as a Member of this House in the Fifty-third to the Sixty-third Congresses, inclusive, died at his home in St. Louis Saturday, March 19, 1932, at the age of 76.

During his long service here he was greatly admired and respected by his colleagues.

I came to the House a short time before Doctor Bartholdt voluntarily retired. He was a great help to me in the beginning of my legislative service here.

He was an able public servant and a fine citizen. It was my good fortune to know him and to have his friendship for more than a quarter of a century.

Doctor Bartholdt was born November 2, 1855, in Schleitz, Germany, and came to the United States after being graduated from high school.

Stopping first in Brooklyn, he entered newspaper work as a printer. From there he went to Philadelphia and later to St. Louis. After receiving his citizenship, Doctor Bartholdt returned to Germany, where he studied law.

Coming back to St. Louis in 1884, he took charge of the Tribune, evening German daily. During his previous stay he was married to Cecilie Niedner, who died several years ago.

Entering politics first as a member of the school board, Doctor Bartholdt made an unsuccessful campaign for Congress in the tenth Missouri district. He ran again in 1892 and was elected at the age of 37. He served continuously for 22 years.

Doctor Bartholdt described his career in his autobiography, From Steerage to Congress, published in 1930. In his book he told of his arrival in the United States in the steerage and details of his rise to Congressman.

As the Albany correspondent for the New York Staats-Zeitung he met Chester A. Arthur, Grover Cleveland, and Theodore Roosevelt. He gave Roosevelt lessons in German.

Mr. Bartholdt, familiarly known as Doctor Bartholdt, became interested in the cause of world peace at the start of his career in the House of Representatives and played an important part in it. He attended the First Hague Peace Conference in 1899 and the conference of the Interparliamentary Union at Christiania, Norway, the same year.

He again went to the Interparliamentary Union in 1903 and extended to the members an invitation to hold their meeting in St. Louis in 1904. He personally arranged the conference, since he had issued the invitation, and was president of the arbitration group. He presided at the conference.

With only one or two exceptions thereafter, Doctor Bartholdt went every year to Europe to attend the meetings of the union.

In recognition of his work with the union his associates suggested him three times for the Nobel peace prize. He was the author of a model arbitration treaty which has received close study among leaders in the world peace movement.

Doctor Bartholdt's activities in Congress included successful work for the rebuilding of Jefferson Barracks and improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. He supported liberal immigration laws and was largely responsible for the $5,000,000 Government appropriation for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis.

Doctor Bartholdt was appointed by President Taft in 1911 as a special envoy to present a statue of Baron von Steuben, German hero in the American Revolution, to Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany. Doctor Bartholdt had sponsored a bill providing for the erection of the original of the statue, which was placed in Washington. He knew many international statesmen, including Count Bismarck, Germany's Iron Chancellor.

Doctor Bartholdt was a life-long Republican, but his liberal views caused him to bolt the party in the last two presidential elections. He supported Alfred E. Smith in 1928 and the late Senator La Follette in 1924.

He made his fifty-sixth crossing of the Atlantic when he went to Germany last year. He returned to St. Louis last October, and in January the University of Jena, Germany, conferred honorary membership on him "for having, while a Member of the United States Congress, always manfully and successfully championed the rights and welfare of his native Germany."

Since his retirement from Congress in 1915, Doctor Bartholdt had lived quietly at his home in St. Louis.

Doctor Bartholdt, noted as an orator in the German and English languages, was often sought as speaker, be it for the celebration of German event or an American. An ardent foe of prohibition, he was often called on to make speeches against this act whenever the occasion called for it.

Doctor Bartholdt as a member of the Liederkranz Club, one of the strongest social organizations of St. Louis, came in contact with all the leading St. Louisians of German birth or abstraction. In turner circles and in benevolent associations, organized and conducted by the German element of St. Louis, Doctor Bartholdt always was a leading figure.

Though he had avowedly retired from politics in 1915, Doctor Bartholdt was urged by his many friends and political followers to reenter politics in 1926 and seek the seat in Congress which he had so long held before. However, on advice of his physician and because of his age, he declined to follow their calling.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE TAX BILL OF 1932

Mr. Laguardia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the Record, for the information of the membership, amendments which I intend to offer to the pending revenue bill at the proper time. The amendments are on the subject of the taxing of stock transfers. I do this because I have had many requests from Members for the exact wording of my proposed amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The first amendment will be as follows:

Page 257, line 21, strike out the figure "100," the balance of the line, all of lines 22, 23, 24, and all of line 1 on page 258 and the words "may be" in line 2 thereof and insert in lieu thereof the following: "on each sale, or agreement to sell, or memorandum of sales or delivery of, or transfers of legal title to any of the shares or certificates, one-fourth of one per cent of the sale or transfer price of the share, provided that in no case shall the amount of such tax be less than 4 cents a share."

This amendment simply provides a tax of one-fourth of one per cent on all transfers of stock and on all transactions of the various stock exchanges. In order to meet the situation, on short sales a separate provision will be offered in the form of a separate and distinct section, as follows: Page 259, after line 10, add the following paragraph:

(b) In addition to the tax provided for in subsection (a) there shall be an additional tax on each short sale, or agreement to sell short, or memorandum of short sale, or delivery of, or transfer of legal title to any shares or certificates of stock or rights to subscribe for or to receive such shares or certificates of stock, made before the seller acquires title and unqualified ownership of the shares so sold, of an additional one-fourth of one per cent of the sale or transfer price of the shares, whether made upon or shown by the books of the corporation or other organization, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum of other evidence of transfer or sale (whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such share, certificate, interest, or rights, or not): Provided, That it is not intended by this title to impose a tax upon an agreement evidencing a deposit of certificates as collateral security for money loaned thereon, which certificates are not actually sold, nor upon the delivery or transfer for such purpose of certificates so deposited, nor upon the return of stock loaned: Provided further, That the tax shall not be imposed upon deliveries or transfers by a broker to a customer for whom and upon whose order he has purchased same, but such deliveries or transfers by a broker to a customer for whom and upon whose order he has purchased same, but such deliveries or transfers is shown only by the books of the corporation or other organization the stamp shall be placed upon such books; and where the change of ownership is by transfer of the certificate the stamp shall be placed upon the certificate; and in cases of an agreement to sell or where the transfer is by delivery of the certificate assigned in blank there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill or memorandum of sale or agreement to sell before mentioned shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers. Any person liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person, who makes any such sale, or who in pursuance of any such sale delivers any certificate or evidence of the sale of any stock, share, interest or right, or bill or memorandum thereof, as herein required, without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guil

(c) Subsections (a) and (b) shall take effect on the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table to-morrow I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that immediately after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table he may be permitted to address the House to-morrow for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MEET THE DEFICIT BY CUTTING EXPENSES

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record on the sales tax.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that permission under the general order of the House.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, probably no bill has been presented at this session of Congress that is of greater importance than the so-called tax bill, known as H. R. 10236. All reports will show that the revenues of the Government at present are insufficient to pay the expenses. One of two proposals must be followed in order to make the revenue and the expenses meet. One is to increase taxes. The other is to reduce expenditures. As a substitute for the two foregoing proposals, perhaps a combination of the two might produce the desired results, namely, make up a part of the deficit by cutting expenses, and increase taxes slightly. I am of the opinion that a great deal of our present problem has been caused by the fact that the Federal Government, during the past decade, has interested itself in affairs with which it should not have had anything to do, which has increased the cost of the Federal Government to a point where taxes have become very burdensome.

Section 8 of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. If our activities were confined to this section of the Constitution, I am of the opinion that most, if not all, of the following items could be eliminated from our present Federal expenditures. I believe in this list of expenditures there are items which, if eliminated, would solve our present deficiency problem.

I offer the suggestion to the Congress for its serious consideration:

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be privileged to address the House to-morrow for 10 minutes immediately following the address of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MUD RIVER IN THE STATE OF KENTUCKY

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 5865, declaring the Mud River in the State of Kentucky a nonnavigable stream.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHEVY CHASE CIRCLE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Joint Resolution 152, for the improvement of Chevy Chase Circle with a fountain and appropriate landscape treatment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there seems to be anything but unanimity of opinion on the part of residents in and around this circle as to the advisability of this proposed fountain. It seems to me there is some merit in the objection that is being made to the effect that the donation of $10,000 would put up a very meager fountain at this point. I think that rather than rushing the bill through—and I do not think there is any immediate urgency—it would be well to allow this matter to go over for a while. I will be glad to give the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bloom] the objections I have, so that he may straighten them out.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say to the gentleman that no one appeared before the committee and objected to this proposition. If it requires an additional sum, the people are willing to donate it. What we would like to do is to have this started for the bicentennial year; and if we do not get it started now, we will not be able to finish it in time.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am sure a $10,000 fountain at Chevy Chase Circle will not be a very impressive monument.

Mr. BLOOM. It has to be submitted to the Fine Arts Commission, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I think the gentleman had better let this go over for a while. I have no personal interest in the matter except we do not want to mar the city beautiful of Washington, and this would certainly do it.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say to the gentleman that the beauty of the city could not be marred, because this has to be approved by the Fine Arts Commission, and there is no reason for any objection of that kind.

Mr. Laguardia. That is just what I want to do. I want to take it up with the Fine Arts Commission, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia]?

There was no objection.

PORTRAIT OF FORMER PRESIDENT COOLIDGE

The Clerk called the next business on the Consent Calendar, S. J. Res. 75, a joint resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on the Library to procure an oil portrait of former President Calvin Coolidge.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWALS OF PUBLIC LANDS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8087, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to vacate withdrawals of public lands under the reclamation law, with reservation of rights, ways, and easements.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill and I ask that this go over without prejudice. The Committee on the Public Lands will have the call on Calendar Wednesday very shortly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS FOX RIVER IN KANE COUNTY, ILL.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8236, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois to reconstruct a free highway bridge across the Fox River at Geneva, in Kane County, State of Illinois.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS FOX RIVER IN M'HENRY COUNTY, ILL.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8237, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois to construct a free highway bridge across the Fox River, 5½ miles south of McHenry, in McHenry County, State of Illinois.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request as to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

JURISDICTION OF WAR DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN COUNTRY

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8178, a bill to transfer certain jurisdiction from the War Department in the management of Indian country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. There is a similar Senate bill at the desk.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 3322) be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2139 of the United States Revised Statutes, and the act of January 30, 1897 (29 Stat. 506), now section 241, title 25, United States Code, be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 241. Intoxicating liquors; sale to Indians or introducing into Indian country: No ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquor or liquors of whatever kind shall be introduced, under any pretense, into the Indian country. Every person who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors of any kind to any Indian under charge of an Indian superintendent or agent, or introduces or attempts to introduce any ardent spirits, ale, wine, beer, or intoxicating liquors of any kind into the Indian country shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years and by fine of not more than $300 for each offense.

"Any person who shall sell, give away, dispose of, exchange, or barter any malt, spirituous, or vinous liquor, including beer, ale, wine, or any ardent or other intoxicating liquor of any kind whatsoever, or any essence, extract, bitters, preparation, compound, composition, or any article whatsoever, under any name, label, or brand, which produces intoxication, to any Indian or ward of the Government under charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or any Indian, including mixed bloods, over whom the Government, through its departments, exercises guardianship, and any person who shall introduce or attempt to introduce any malt, spirituous, or vinous liquor, including beer, ale, and wine, or any ardent or intoxicating liquor of any kind whatsoever into the Indian country, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 60 days and by a fine of not less than $100 for the first offense and not less than $200 for each offense thereafter: Provided, however, That the person convicted shall be committed until fine and costs are paid. But it shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors into Indian country that the acts charged were done under authority, in writing, from the Interior Department or any officer duly authorized thereunto by the Interior Department."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I merely want to call the attention of the House to the fact that with the wet leader, the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Linthicum], present on the floor, and also with the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia], the wet leader from the Republican side of the aisle, present on the floor, both of them vigilant, active always, one of the most drastic prohibition laws in the history of the country has come up for passage by unanimous consent. It applies, however, to the first Americans—the Indians. It prevents all kinds of liquor from being given to, sold to, or used by them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This was the law where I was raised, in Arizona, 50 years ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the gentleman was raised on it, just like he was on the milk bottle, but he has gotten away from it all, except with reference to the Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Prohibition has nothing to do with

Mr. BLANTON. These wet gentlemen recognize that prohibition is good for the Indians and they let it pass by unanimous consent without objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

COEUR D'ALENE AND ST. JOE NATIONAL FORESTS

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6659, for the inclusion of certain lands in the Coeur d'Alene and St. Joe National Forests, in the State of Idaho, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

ACT TO AMEND SECTION 8 OF THE ACT OF JUNE 19, 1886

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8875, to amend section 8 of the act of June 19, 1886, as amended by section 2 of the act of February 17, 1898 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 289).

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to that.

Mr. BOYLAN. I object to the bill.

SINGERS AND CHORISTERS

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8978, to clarify the application of the contract labor provisions of the immigration laws to singers and choristers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I am not in sympathy with the latter-day policy of keeping out artists who come here to entertain the American public.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will examine the bill—

Mr. STAFFORD. I have examined the bill carefully.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The bill is carefully written and is designed to protect singers and artists in this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill would keep out many performers who have entertained Presidents.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; it protects the contract-labor provisions with regard to the arrival of talented singers, and I think it takes care of such as organizations.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he will not withdraw his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. DYER. This is for the purpose of protecting American artists in this country.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

IMPROVING INLAND WATERWAY FROM NORFOLK, VA., TO BEAUFORT, N. C.

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6184, for the improvement of the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give further consideration to this bill. Since it was last up I have made some investigation, but there is one further question I wish to investigate. I have written the Chief of Engineers in regard to the matter, and would like to have it go over for another two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, RANDOLPH, MO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8072) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Randolph, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would not object to the bill if it is amended so as to limit this to a railroad bridge, in conformity with the recommendation of the Roads Bureau. This is a third extension that this promotion has had, and seemingly it has not materialized yet.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, it has not, for the reason that there have been negotiations between certain railroads out there, and they have not been able to complete those negotiations.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am not objecting to it as a railroad bridge, if the gentleman will accept an amendment in line 4, after the word "of," strike out the word "the" and insert "a railroad," so that it will read "construction of a railroad bridge," and so forth.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I could not agree to that without consulting the Member who introduced the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRIVILEGES, RULES, AND REGULATIONS FOR CANAL ZONE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7518) to amend an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman from California [Mr. Lea] was kind enough two weeks ago to let this matter go over. I have looked into it, and I find that as a result of existing regulations the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone has so modified the sanitary laws and the quarantine laws as to create a great deal of havoc in the policy of this Government. For instance, he has issued a regulation under the powers now vested in him, under existing law, permitting all vessels to enter the Canal Zone with a simple certificate from any local official, while the quarantine laws of the United States require a health certificate from the American consul.

In other words, any ship leaving a foreign port and coming to the United States or to any possession of the United States must have a bill of health from the American consul. but owing to the powers given to the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone he has so changed the regulations as to have thrown into confusion the Department of State and the Department of the Treasury. The amendment which the gentleman from California was kind enough to submit to me, while at first blush seemed satisfactory, still leaves with the governor entirely too much discretion. What we desire to do is to have some sort of standard requirements for the practice of medicine in the Canal Zone. I suggest the following amendment to the gentleman from California, that in line 9 of the bill, page 2, after the word "issued," insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That all applicants for a license to practice the healing art shall qualify before a licensing board, the members of which shall be the senior medical officers of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service on duty in the Canal Zone and one member selected by the governor.

That would establish a reasonable control, and while the territory is small, surely the gentleman from California can see the danger that might ensue if at any time we had a governor who had peculiar or fixed notions in respect to the matter of medicine or the art of healing.

Mr. LEA. The only physicians permitted to practice there at the present time, those who are licensed, are employees of the Government, outside of physicians from the Republic of Panama, who are permitted to practice in the Canal Zone.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think the bill is really nec-essarv.

Mr. LEA. There is a board of health there. Will the gentleman be willing to let them pass on the sufficiency of the applicant? The present regulations are copied after those of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who is on the board of health?

Mr. LEA. I could not tell you.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a governmental board of health.

Mr. LEA. Yes; it is a Canal Zone Board of Health.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. LEA. Then suppose we amend it so that it will read "under regulations prescribed by him," that being the President, and strike out the words "under regulations to be prescribed by the governor" and insert "the Board of Health of the Canal Zone."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes. That would be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With that understanding, I shall not object.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act approved August 21, 1916 (ch. 371, 39 Stat. 527), is hereby amended to read as follows: "That, until otherwise provided by Congress, the President is authorized to make rules and regulations in matters of sanitation, health, and quarantine for the Canal Zone or to modify or change existing rules and regulations and those hereafter made from time to time: Provided, That the President may authorize the Governor of the Panama Canal to issue licenses to practice the healing art under regulations to be prescribed by the governor, which regulations shall include conditions under which such the healing art under regulations to be prescribed by the governor, which regulations shall include conditions under which such licenses shall be issued and include provisions for revocation for cause of licenses issued. Violations of any quarantine regulations provided for herein shall be punished by fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment in jail not to exceed 90 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court; and a violation of any sanitary or health regulation authorized hereunder shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $25 or by imprisonment in jail not to exceed 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Each day such violation may continue shall constitute a separate offense."

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the act approved August 21, 1916 (ch. 371, 39 Stat. 527), is hereby amended to read as follows:

371, 39 Stat. 527), is hereby amended to read as follows

"SEC. 4. Whoever shall be guilty of any conduct which tends to disturb the peace or the orderly administration of government, or injure the morals, safety, or health of the community, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor, except as may be otherwise specifically provided in the laws of the Canal Zone."

Sec. 3. That section 5 of said act approved August 21, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 5. Any person who commits any act or who carries on any business, trade, or occupation in the Canal Zone without complying with the rules and regulations established by the President for the levying, assessing, and collecting of taxes, or who violates any rules or regulations for the use of the public roads and highways, or who violates any rules and regulations touching the licensing, taxes, operation, and use of self-propelled vehicles, shall be punished by fine not to exceed $25 or by imprisonment in jail not to exceed 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the court's discretion."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out sections 2 and 3

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Lea: Page 2, line 4, after the word "President," insert "under regulations prescribed by him," and after the word "the," in the same line, strike out the word "Governor" and insert "Public Health Board of the Canal Zone"; and in line 5, after the word "art," strike out the words "under regulations to be prescribed by the Governor."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AMENDING THE PENAL CODE OF THE CANAL ZONE

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar. H. R. 7519, to amend the Penal Code of the Canal Zone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object-of course, I shall not object-I simply want to confess I have not had time to study the bill carefully and therefore I am disqualified to pass judgment upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as this and the next bill provide for the criminal procedure applicable to the Canal Zone and as they are quite lengthy, I thought it might be practicable if both bills be passed over temporarily, to be taken up later in the after-

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. I think it would be well for the gentleman from California [Mr. Lea] to state who prepared these codifications of laws. There are other similar bills that will be reached soon on the calendar.

Mr. LEA. I gave a full statement to the House at the session two weeks ago, explaining somewhat in detail the way in which this codification was prepared. A special codifier was employed, furnished by the West Publishing Co. He went to Panama and studied these measures for 15 months. As a committee working with him were the district judge of the Canal Zone and also the district attorney. Subsequently the bills were studied and revised by a committee of eight, appointed by the governor. Then, subsequent to that, the bar association studied them.

Mr. COLLINS. Who composed that committee of eight? Mr. LEA. They were appointees of the governor and employees of the Canal Zone. Of course, all American citizens there are employees. Six of those men were lawyers, members of that committee. In addition to that the bar association made a study of them, and also the Metal Trades Council appointed a committee which made a study of the bills after they were printed. All agree that they would prefer to have the bills passed as they are. Some of them preferred changes, but, taking these measures as they are, all persons interested in the zone preferred to have the bills passed rather than have any delay.

Mr. COLLINS. Has the gentleman the changes that were suggested?

Mr. LEA. Yes; the changes are set forth more or less in detail in the report, but in the main they are a revision of the existing law, except the Civil Code, which is a new code.

Mr. COLLINS. What has the commission done on this situation? The administration of the civil laws of the Canal Zone is under the War Department. The War Department recommends the judge, the district attorney, and the other court officers. I believe the administration of civil justice on the Canal Zone ought to be under the jurisdiction of officials responsible to civilian authority.

Mr. LEA. The President now has authority to place it under the Attorney General, and the governor and the Secretary of War have agreed that shall be done. We contemplated offering legislation covering that matter, but inasmuch as the President has the power already, and the governor has consented to this exercise, as well as the Secretary of War, we concluded to dispose of it in that way.

Mr. COLLINS. There is nothing in these codification bills that might be regarded as a continuation of the old system, is there?

Mr. LEA. Not in that respect. We have already passed a bill which more or less radically changes the judicial system, and we tried to give the judge more independence than he has ever had before. We have placed the marshal and the district attorney under the direct appointment of the President.

Mr. COLLINS. Who recommends the appointment of the judge, the district attorney, and the marshal under the new system?

Mr. LEA. The Attorney General would recommend the appointment as soon as that system is made the order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of objection, if it is the wish of the gentleman from California to go ahead with this and the next bill at the present time, I have no objection. I thought it would expedite consideration of the bills finally if we passed over these two revision bills temporarily.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, after the passage of this bill, if it is passed. I will ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the reading of the two large codes to follow in order to save time. I would say to the Speaker that one of these codes involves over 500 pages, and it would manifestly be hard to read to-day. Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have examined somewhat carefully the bill at present under consideration, and the following bill providing, respectively, for the codification of the Penal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but I have not examined the two lengthy bills following, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to have those two following bills passed over without prejudice. These two I am ready to have disposed of at the present time.

Mr. LEA. Well, I would not object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., that section 1 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is hereby amended to read as follows:
"Section 1. That this act shall hereafter be known as the 'Criminal Code of the Canal Zone.'"
Sec. 2. That section 4 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That section 6 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4a. That section 14 of the Penal Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

PRIVILEGES, RULES, AND REGULATIONS FOR THE CANAL ZONE

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I find that in adopting an amendment a while ago we duplicated some of the existing language. In order to make that clerical correction I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (H. R. 7518) to amend an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, selfpropelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits, and vacate the proceedings by which that bill was passed."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to the bill H. R. 7518 and vacate the proceedings by which that bill was passed, for the purpose of making a correction. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. On page 2, line 4, strike out the words "of the Panama Canal."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Lea: On page 2, line 4, strike out the words "of the Panama Canal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE FOR THE CANAL ZONE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7520, to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure for the Canal Zone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it is due the House that the gentleman should make a brief explanation of this important bill, which relates to the criminal procedure that will be applicable to the Canal Zone, particularly so far as it affects the jury system and the changes in the rules of evidence that are prescribed in this bill.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, this is a revision of the criminal law adopted for the Canal Zone by order of the Isthmian Canal Commission in 1904. The partial adoption of the Penal Code of California at that time was intended to be temporary. It was done hastily and not in a thorough manner. It is found defective in many respects. Since that time the jury-trial system has been adopted for the Canal Zone. In 1908 a man was hanged in the Canal Zone without a jury trial, as the law provided no jury trial. Since that a law providing for jury trials has been adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was that a trial by the court in the district court?

Mr. LEA. It was tried by three judges under the system that prevailed at that time. Those courts have since been abolished. That led to the establishment of the jury system, so that one purpose of revising this Criminal Code is to adapt it to the jury system of trial.

Another thing proposed by this code is to provide a probation system for the Canal Zone, which does not exist at the present time. This code applies that system both to the district court and the magistrate courts for a limited period.

Another important phase of this revision is that in the main it eliminates the minimum penalties and leaves the penalty in the discretion of the judge, limited only by the maximum penalty. Then there is a change in the jurisdiction of the magistrate courts, raising the fine that may be imposed from $25 to $100 in criminal cases.

Then there is also a provision definitely permitting the imprisonment of a man in any of the jails in the zone instead of requiring him to be confined in a particular jail in the district where he is convicted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. My attention was directed to the amendment of section 9 as found on page 11 of the report, where you make all laws of the United States applicable to the Canal Zone. I wish to inquire whether under existing practice there is such an extensive and all-pervading provision making the laws of the United States, so far as applicable, cover the Canal Zone? I direct the gentleman's attention to page 11 of the report, section 9.

Every person is liable to punishment by the law of the Canal

And here is the amendment:

Or by the laws of the United States applicable to the Canal Zone, for an offense committed by him therein.

So you are extending very generally the criminal laws of the United States-of course, so far as they may be applicable—to the Canal Zone, whereas before a person could only be punished for violation of the laws of the Canal Zone.

Mr. LEA. The reason for this section grew out of the dispute among lawyers as to what are laws of the Canal Zone. The contention by one group of lawyers is that laws can not be called Canal Zone laws unless they are made especially for the Canal Zone. So they have made this distinction between the laws. One class they call the Canal Zone laws and the other the United States laws, which are specifically made applicable to the Canal Zone.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here you are going to extend all criminal law, so far as applicable to the Canal Zone, as being the basis for punishment for offenses in the Canal Zone.

Mr. LEA. No; it is not the intention to make all laws of the United States applicable, but only those that are made applicable specifically.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the reading of the amendment, and I think we should hesitate before we go ahead with the consideration of the bill under unanimous consent. Section 9, as appears in the report at page 11, reads, as amended, as follows:

Every person is liable to punishment by the law of the Canal Zone, or by the laws of the United States applicable to the Canal Zone, for an offense committed by him therein.

You are now broadening very generally by that language—and counter to the opinion of the gentleman just expressed, that it is only the intention to make those laws applicable for offenses which are designated to be applicable in the Canal Zone.

Mr. LEA. I am under the impression that the terms of the bill itself sustain the distinction I make.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am making my inquiry based upon the change of existing law as found in the report on page 11.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. HOCH. As I read this, I think the gentleman misinterprets the intention. The language is, "or by the laws of the United States applicable to the Canal Zone." This would seem to me to limit it to the laws of the United States which in their terms are made applicable to the Canal Zone.

Mr. STAFFORD. With all due deference, I think it would bear a much broader construction. Any criminal law that would be applicable would be held under that phraseology to embody offenses committed in the Canal Zone.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman note that language again very carefully, and let us read the whole section:

Every person is liable to punishment by the law of the Canal Zone, or by the laws of the United States applicable to the Canal Zone, for an offense committed by him therein.

It seems to me that plainly means simply those laws of the United States which are applicable to the Canal Zone, and they could only be applicable to the Canal Zone when they are specifically made applicable in the statute itself.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there ought to be a clarifying amendment to express the intendment of the Congress.

Mr. HOCH. If we would insert after the words "United States," the words "which are," would not that make it beyond any question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so.

Mr. LEA. That would be agreeable.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as fol-

CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE FOR THE CANAL ZONE

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the next two bills on the Consent Calendar (H. R. 7521 and H. R. 7522) be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

MAILING OF SECOND-CLASS MATTER

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 4594, to fix the rate of postage on publications mailed at the post office of entry for delivery at another post office within the postal district in which the headquarters or general business offices of the publisher are located.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I notice that the committee by the proposed bill is granting a preference to the publishers who have already availed themselves of the privilege of establishing subsidiary branch offices. That is accomplished by the last clause beginning on line 11:

But this provision shall not be applicable to publications already entered as second-class matter which retain their entry at the post office where now entered.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The purpose of the bill is to prevent an abuse in the future and is recommended by the department and the committee on that ground.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent has it been abused?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There are, perhaps, 100 publications of this character. I will say that applies largely to publications of a religious, educational, and fraternal class issued by associations that are not operated for profit. Under the law they are chargeable with postage at the rate of 1 or 2 cents a copy, according to the frequency of the issue of the publication or the weight of the publication. Sometimes they will go 50 miles from the office of publication and secure entry in order to avoid payment of this postage rate and secure instead a rate of 11/2 cents a pound.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that the bill would be improved by inserting at the end of line 4, page 2, the phrase "such or at "?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It would have to be at a "different" post office. They could not get the low rate unless it was

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If this change is necessary and beneficial, why is the last provision inserted in the bill?-

But this provision shall not be applicable to publications already entered as second-class matter which retain their entry at the post office where now entered.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. This is the question that the gentleman from Wisconsin put, and I have just answered by pointing out the character of these publications and suggesting that we had best confine this provision to future action.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I was absent from the Chamber for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 286 of title 39 of the United States Code is hereby amended by the addition of the following

"Copies of a publication, other than a weekly, hereafter admitted to the second class of mail matter, when mailed by the publisher or registered news agent at a post office where it is entered, for delivery by letter carriers at a different post office within the delivery limits of which the headquarters or general business offices of the publisher are located, shall be chargeable with postage at the rate that would be applicable if the copies were mailed at the latter office, unless the postage chargeable at the pound rates from the office of mailing is higher, in which case such higher rates shall apply, but this provision shall not be applicable to publications already entered as second-class matter which retain their entry at the post office where now entered."

With the following committee amendment:

In line 3, page 1, strike out "section 286 of title 39 of the United States Code" and insert in lieu thereof "section 25 of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. 361, U. S. C., title 39, sec. 286)" 39, sec. 286)."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what has so far been done, if anything, toward this project?

Mr. MILLIGAN. I do not think anything has been done. Does the gentleman mean the actual work upon the bridge?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I do not think anything.

Mr. DYER. Is it to be simply a bridge for this company, a rail bridge for the street-car company?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the gentleman's attention to letter of the vice president of the railroad company which says $265,000 up to the present time has been expended.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I was referring to the actual work on the bridge.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is obtaining rights of way?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have been objecting to this bill. It is a private enterprise, and I understand that no progress has been made on the promotion.

Mr. JACOBSEN. There has not been on the promotion. Mr. ALLEN. The bridge is being financed now by the city.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Yes; the city voted it 3 to 1.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman states this concession has been turned over to the city of Bettendorf?

Mr. JACOBSEN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And they have authorized a bond issue?

Mr. JACOBSEN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So that it will be a municipal enterprise?

Mr. JACOBSEN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. In order to float the bond issue, they have to have an extension.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I have no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT GRAND RAPIDS, MINN.

BRIDGE ACROSS BAY OF SAN FRANCISCO FROM RINCON HILL DISTRICT IN SAN FRANCISCO BY WAY OF GOAT ISLAND TO OAKLAND

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, S. 3282, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from the Rincon Hill district in San Francisco by way of Goat Island to Oakland.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco, at or near the general site from Rincon Hill, in the city and county of San Francisco, to and across Goat Island, in San Francisco Bay, thence to Oakland, in the county of Alameda, authorized to be built by the State of California, by an act of Congress approved February 20, 1931, are hereby extended two and seven years, respectively, from February 20, 1932.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

Will the lady from California inform the House what, if any, progress has been made under this valuable franchise that was granted by the last Congress?

Mrs. KAHN. There certainly has been progress made. The State appropriated $650,000 to start the work. All the preliminary borings have been made. We simply have this bill as a safeguard, because the State expects to sell the bonds, and this bill is simply a safeguard for the bonds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the lady give any estimate as to when this great project is likely to be completed, so persons going across the continent may have the advantage of this great highway bridge?

Mrs. KAHN. They hope to have it completed within the time limit set by the committee. The Senate gave them a little longer, but the House committee, as I understand, has a rule about not extending the time beyond a certain number of years for completion. Of course, I do not know, in this period of depression, how successful they will be, but we hope they will be able to sell the $75,000,000 of bonds. Meantime they have appropriated out of the public treasury an amount of $650,000, and the work has progressed.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROTECTION OF THE PALO VERDE VALLEY, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4715, for the protection of the Palo Verde Valley, State of California, against injury or destruction by reason of Colorado River floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I find this language in the letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the committee:

My suggestion is that transfer of the sum of $70,000 to the reclamation fund under one of the flood control bills now pending before the House be authorized as an emergency measure.

I note the bill provides for an authorization of $200,000 annually for five years. How are you going to finance this?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to the bill because it is not in accordance with the President's financial program. It involves the large sum of $1,000,000. The Interior Department reports that the expenditure at this time of this $1,000,000 would not be in accord with the financial program of the President. I am against spending every million dollars that is not necessary and which can be saved. Only by stopping these expenditures may we ever expect to balance the Budget. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS OF HOSPITALIZATION IN THE SOLDIERS' HOMES TO CERTAIN PERSONS WHO SERVED IN THE QUARTER-MASTER CORPS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4724, to confer to certain persons who served in the Quartermaster Corps or under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition the benefits of hospitalization and the privileges of the soldiers' homes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, since this bill was last under consideration I have noted that they are seeking to extend the provisions of the World War veterans' act to these former employees of the Quartermaster Corps. I wish to confer with the author of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIAN CEMETERY RESERVES ON THE WICHITA INDIAN RESERVATION IN OKLAHOMA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8691, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 3409 for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to advertise and sell to he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to advertise and sell to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than the appraised value, the following-described tracts of land on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma: SE. ¼ SE. ¼, sec. 3, T. 9 N., R. 10 W., Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, 40 acres; and N. ½ NE. ¼ NW. ¼ and SE. ¼ NE. ¼ NW. ¼, sec. 10, T. 7 N., R. 10 W., Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, 30 acres: Provided, That the proceeds derived therefrom shall be used by the Secretary of the Interior in purchasing suitable tracts of land more conveniently situated. purchasing suitable tracts of land more conveniently situated, which may be desired by the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians for cemetery purposes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the House committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Leavitt: At the end of the bill insert: "And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the Indian owners all coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits found at any time in the land."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 8691) was laid on the table.

STATUES OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AND ROBERT E. LEE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Concurrent Resolution 24, thanking the Governor of the State of Virginia for the statues of George Washington and Robert E. Lee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF ROADS AND TRAILS IN THE NATIONAL PARKS AND MONUMENTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6059, to continue the authorization for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges in and approach roads to the national parks and monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why can not this be carried out through the provisions of the road bill we passed a few days ago?

Mr. LEAVITT. That was an emergency bill only and this provides, during the fiscal years 1934 and 1935, for a continuation of the authorization for work that has always gone on in the national parks. Without this legislation the work can not be done during the two years covered in this bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. But under the provisions of the emergency road bill, if you want to call it that, you certainly could do the work next year that you contemplate doing this year.

Mr. LEAVITT. For one year, but it does not give the authorization necessary for the orderly carrying on of the work in the parks. This is a smaller amount than the old authorization, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It is only $5,000,000, of which not to exceed $1,000,000 may be allocated each year. I think the road bill covers this sufficiently.

Mr. LEAVITT. It does not.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. What does the gentleman from Texas think about it?

Mr. BLANTON. I think it does. Why put this additional burden on the Government when the other bill covers it absolutely.

Mr. LEAVITT. No; it does not, except for one year, and not either of those in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think he needs to go now up to 1934, 1935, and 1936? Does he not think Congress is going to meet before then?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I would advise the gentleman not to press this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves $5,000,000, and I object.

CONCURRENT POLICE JURISDICTION OVER THE RIGHTS OF WAY OF THE BLACKFEET HIGHWAY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8914, to accept the grant by the State of Montana of concurrent police jurisdiction over the rights of way of the Blackfeet Highway, and over the rights of way of its connections with the Glacier National Park road system on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in the State of Montana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how is this road going to be policed?

Mr. LEAVITT. It is policed by a motorcycle policeman who now operates along the east side of the Glacier National Park. He has authority on those parts of the road that are within the park but he has no authority over the connecting roads outside.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Does the whole police force consist of one man?

Mr. LEAVITT. Sometimes two.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Do we need an act of Congress for this purpose?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; because you can not confer any jurisdiction on the National Park Service except by accepting the grant of concurrent jurisdiction offered by the State of Montana.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield, I want to ask the gentleman from Montana if he does not think that with a bill of this character there should be a report from a department showing its probable cost to the Government and also showing the uttermost limit of cost?

Mr. LEAVITT. I can state that. It will not cost any more than it does now.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no report from the department on the probable cost to the Government, and inasmuch as the gentleman has passed so many bills here—I think he has the record on the number of bills passed in a Congress—he ought to know that sometimes these things get away from us; and even when the Member who introduces them does not believe they are going to cost much, yet in the final analysis they cost tremendous sums and sometimes amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to reduce the batting average of our colleague from Montana—

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I have another objection to this bill. The Federal Government is called upon to police a State road, a practice that should not be started; therefore, I object to the bill.

COMPACTS OR AGREEMENTS BETWEEN STATES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8897) to authorize compacts or agreements between States relating to service of process and production of witnesses in criminal cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of some member of the Committee on the Judiciary as to the reason for the committee amendment eliminating approval by the legislatures of the respective compacts that are entered into. I should think that the legislatures should certainly exercise their function in passing upon these compacts.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will permit, I think they are to do that under the first paragraph, and the other was considered unnecessary.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. No; I think there is something in what the gentleman from Wisconsin says, and the matter came up in committee. The second section provides first for the ratification of the compact after the agreement has been made, and then it is to be submitted for approval, but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sumners], the author of the bill, is here and I am sure the gentleman will explain it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire, and I am sure other Members of the House would like to know, why the committee recommended the elimination of approval by the legislatures before these compacts would be effectual.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am not sure that I caught the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a bill which the gentleman introduced granting the consent of Congress to the various States to enter into agreements providing for the service of process upon a person living in another State and compelling his attendance as a witness in criminal proceedings. Section 2 of the bill, as the gentleman originally introduced it, provided that these agreements should not be binding unless they had been approved by the legislatures and also by the Congress of the United States. I am not so much concerned about having them approved by the Congress of the United States as I am about having them receive approval by the legislatures.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman who has propounded the interrogation that the reason that particular change was made—I assume the gentleman has no question about having stricken out the provision requiring congressional approval.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I have no objection to that at all. Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. However, with regard to the second proposition, the committee, or at least myself—and I think that is the view of the committee generally—did not think it would be proper—or at least I had that notion—for the Congress to suggest to the State through what agency the State should indicate its approval. This was my own view. Here is a State, and the State legislature has created agencies that may speak for the State, make arrangements for the State, enter into negotiations for the State, and I thought we might leave it to the people of the State to select the agency through which the State could express its approval.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will permit, is there any other agency known to the gentleman from Texas, other than the legislature, to pass upon a matter of this kind?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; I do not know of any other, but I do not want Congress dictating to States as to these agencies through which they may act.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to state to the gentleman that the process by which these agreements are entered into is usually that the legislature in the first instance, after Congress consents, enacts the resolution authorizing the governor of the State to enter into negotiations, and the governor is authorized to conduct these negotiations, and after that is done it has never been looked upon as necessary—

Mr. STAFFORD. As explained by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sumners] and as confirmed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown], the legislature does virtually grant its consent by delegating to certain agencies the right to enter into these compacts.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin it is my judgment that probably there is no agency in any State that is authorized to enter into these compacts other than the legislature.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the query in my mind, whether the governor, ipso facto, without authority deputed to him by the legislature, would have the right to enter into compacts or agreements.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman would agree that they should not without legislative authorization.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not unless the legislature, in the first instance, has created an agency that has the right to do this; and if it has, I do not think it is any business of the Congress to interfere.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. COLLINS. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the bill. I fear, however, with its passage a very doubtful policy is begun. I notice this language in the committee's report:

The purpose of this bill is to remove the constitutional limitation upon the right of States to enter into compacts or agreements and make it possible for them by such agreements to provide that process may run beyond the border of the State issuing the process into a State a party to such agreement.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. Now, how is it possible for this Congress to remove the constitutional limitation?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. This is it. There is a provision in the Federal Constitution prohibiting States entering into compacts except by the consent of Congress. What we propose to do by this act is to remove that limitation in the Federal Constitution and leave the States free to negotiate in regard to the matter.

Mr. COLLINS. Does not the gentleman get himself into this situation? The idea back of that constitutional provision is to give Congress the right to veto or approve of a compact entered into by two or more States. In this case, in advance, the Congress is giving up this right, and are we not indirectly violating this provision of the Constitution?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not at all. The only matter involved is the proposition in regard to this compact, in that a subsequent Congress reserves the right to examine the compact and give its approval. It is a very simple proposition, simply relieving the States from the constitutional limitation.

Mr. COLLINS. Let us take another case. Suppose the States of Alabama and Tennessee and other Southern States adjacent to Muscle Shoals should make an agreement suitable to them as to a division of power generated at Muscle Shoals, could the Congress in advance of any such agreement ratify that agreement?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not take us so far afield.

Mr. COLLINS. I am afraid that we are setting a very bad precedent. Not that I have any objection to the purpose of this particular bill, but it seems that we are getting into territory that we ought to stay out of. We ought not in advance of these compacts to ratify them.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let me state the concrete proposition. What is it? That States may enter into compacts to do a definite thing-remove the barrier and make it possible for the process of the State to reach beyond the border of a single State. This is very important. The Committee on the Judiciary is under tremendous pressure to increase the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The rapidity of transportation makes it possible for criminals and witnesses to get quickly beyond the border of the State in which the crime is supposed to be committed. There is freedom of movement between these States. Almost the only time the State barrier goes up is when a State is pursuing a criminal or seeking to get witnesses. This is a plain, practical, common-sense proposition. If we do not move in the direction indicated by this bill, the Federal Government has got to take over jurisdiction as to crimes where it is made possible because of the greatly extended interstate provisions. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. COLLINS. Let me say that I think this bill ought to go over, so that Members may think about the farreaching possibilities of such legislation. Also its constitutionality.

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to make a short statement. The gentleman from Mississippi raises a very important question as to whether Congress shall give its consent in advance to do certain things in regard to compacts between the States. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the States can enter into compacts without the consent of Congress given in advance and may sometimes by act of Congress later ratify it. It has been held that where States have entered into a compact, like Virginia and Maryland, and that compact is permitted to go on for years without objection, that that was virtually ratified. So the objection of the gentleman has no effect on the situation.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is just arguing my side of the proposition.

Mr. McKEOWN. We had a proposition of this kind up between the State of Texas and the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. DYER. This is not new.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Joint Resolution 320, to authorize an appropriation for the American group of the Interparliamentary Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I understand that this is the same appropriation usually made. I would like to have some explanation of what the money is used for in connection with this conference.

Mrs. OWEN. This appropriation covers the expenses of the American delegates.

Mr. GREENWOOD. How many delegates go?

Mrs. OWEN. The selection of the delegates depends upon the will of the interparliamentary group in Congress. The year that I attended, 1930, we had 15 delegates.

Mr. GREENWOOD. What practical results have ever come from these conferences in proposing legislation?

Mrs. OWEN. I should be very glad to answer the gentleman's question, citing my own personal experience. When I went as a delegate in 1930 I was appointed to the International Committee on Legislation for Women, Children, and Labor. This permitted me not only to participate in the international discussions of this subcommittee at London, but it makes me now the recipient of all the international surveys on those questions. Since our 1930 meeting tor Francois, of Belgium, has been gathering together statistical surveys of all of the legislation on these subjects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not that very work being done in connection with other leagues of an international character? All these labor statistics come from Geneva from another international organization.

Mrs. OWEN. I believe there is no other in which the members of parliaments have an opportunity to discuss these questions amongst themselves.

Where are the docu-Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

ments belonging to the Congress of the United States?

Mrs. OWEN. The major purpose of the Interparliamentary Union is to permit members of the congresses and parliaments to benefit by the discussion of public questions. further benefit is represented by the subsequent work of the subcommittees, through which members may familiarize themselves with the experience of all nations in respect to a

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This thing has gone on year in and year out, and what has been accomplished from it? Nothing but talk, conversation, and good feeling, apparently to very little purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to our friend from Washington [Mr. Johnson] and to our friend from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] that if they were here when the Interparliamentary Union met several years ago in this Chamber, representing some 44 countries, they would have seen some of the benefits that I think are derived from this convention by all of the people of all the countries.

So far as the meeting at Geneva is concerned, Congress appropriated $300,000, and this sum now asked is a mere bagatelle compared with the Geneva appropriation, this little $10,000 that is being asked for here.

Mr. PARKS. What good does it do?

Mr. BLANTON. I think it does a great deal of good.

Mr. PARKS. What?

Mr. BLANTON. It gives the members of every congress of every nation the privilege of meeting and exchanging views on vital subjects, out of which grows friendly contacts helpful to all peoples.

Mr. PARKS. Was that of very great value to the coun-

Mr. BLANTON. I deem it well worth $10,000 to the United States, as the absence of our delegates would be especially noted to the detriment of our Nation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TRANSFERRING CERTAIN LAND TO THE NAVY DEPARTMENT, VALLEJO, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9146) authorizing the transfer of certain lands near Vallejo, Calif., from the United States Housing Corporation to the Navy Department for naval purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEASING OF INDIAN LANDS, RED LAKE RESERVATION, MINN.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 472) to authorize the leasing of unallotted tribal Indian lands in the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice. The Indian Committee will have a day very shortly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CLAIMS OF EASTERN EMMIGRANT AND WESTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9441) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to the committee, under the leadership of our chairman, Sena- | and Western Cherokee Indians of Oklahoma and North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I object.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman withhold his objec-

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I think I can make a satisfactory explanation of the bill. This bill passed the House at the last session of Congress. It passed the Senate a few days ago. All that the bill does is to permit the two divisions or parties of the Cherokee Tribe to intervene in suits that are already pending in the Court of Claims, brought under the act of March 19, 1924. When the Cherokee Tribe of Indians resided east of the Mississippi River, occupying the territory around Chattanooga, in Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina, certain of them removed west prior to the treaty of 1925. That constituted about one-fourth of the

They were afterwards known as old settlers. Some of them moved west subsequent to the treaty of 1835, and they were thereafter known as Eastern or Emmigrant Cherokee. Congress, by an act of March 19, 1924, authorized the Cherokee Nation to bring suit in the Court of Claims for any claim which it might have against the Government of the United States, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. It is suggested that perhaps these two divisions, namely, about one-fourth of them that removed west as old settlers prior to the treaty of 1835, and those who removed subsequent to the treaty of 1835, known as Eastern Emmigrant Cherokees, might have some claims that will not be adjudicated in these suits, and this bill only gives those two divisions of the Cherokee Tribe a right to intervene in those suits.

That is all it is. The suits are already pending. This will give them one year within which to intervene in the pending suits. I can not see any possible objection to the bill. This bill passed the last session of Congress. It did not pass the Senate on account of the congestion. It passed the Senate the other day, and there is a Senate bill on the Speaker's

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman say that this bill passed the last Congress?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes, sir; in exactly these identical words, because I copied and reintroduced the bill as it passed. Mr. STAFFORD. It got by me, then.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no. The gentleman understood it. I explained it to the gentleman in colloquy, because we eliminated the objection of the Secretary of the Interior in the amended bill. I have reintroduced it exactly as it passed last year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TRANSFERRING JURISDICTION OVER PUBLIC LANDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, S. 2498, to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public land in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. COLLINS. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. May I ask the gentleman what his objections are to this bill?

Mr. COLLINS. My objection is based upon my experience in dealing with the affairs of the District of Columbia. In several instances in the past I have noticed that the District has traded away land for other land of comparable size, but hear and determine certain claims of the Eastern Emmigrant | the land traded was worth three or four times as much as the land it acquired. I think these bills to exchange property should come to Congress for its approval.

Mr. DALLINGER. This does not. This only transfers jurisdiction.

Mr. COLLINS. That is exactly what I want to prevent.

Mr. DALLINGER. It has to be by mutual agreement between the authorities of the Federal Government and the authorities of the District of Columbia.

Mr. COLLINS. I understand that, but I have seen instances where I thought the right was abused.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DALLINGER. I yield. Mr. STAFFORD. Under this bill, would it permit the Commission on Public Buildings and Parks, or the authority which has jurisdiction over the Botanic Gardens, to get together and say, "We will transfer this to another agency," without the knowledge of Congress?

Mr. DALLINGER. Oh, no. Mr. STAFFORD. Why not?

Mr. DALLINGER. Not at all. Mr. STAFFORD. Why not? The phraseology is all per-

Mr. DALLINGER. This simply transfers jurisdiction.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would authorize the District authorities to get together with the respective Federal bodies and agree upon a transfer of jurisdiction without notice to Congress whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION ACT TO AID THE TOTALLY DISABLED

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 92, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, and acts in amendment thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the author of the bill is not present.

Mr. BLANTON. I object for the present, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. Three objections are necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, in view of the gentleman not allowing it to go over without prejudice.

Mr. COLLINS. I object.

SILVER SERVICE TO ALABAMA SOCIETY OF FINE ARTS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6444, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Alabama Society of Fine Arts, the silver service presented to the United States for the U.S.S. Montgomery.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the fundamental principle, but customarily in these bills provision is made so that the department may recall the silver service in case of need. I suppose it is the intention of the chairman of the committee to permit this silver service, in case there would be another vessel named in honor of the city which he so creditably represents, to have it recalled for that purpose?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That will be perfectly agreeable. Mr. STAFFORD. I have prepared an amendment to offer at the end of the bill providing for that.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Alabama Society of Fine Arts, for preservation and exhibition, the silver service which was presented to the United States for the U. S. S. Montgomery by the citizens of that State: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for the delivery of such silver service.

Mr. STAFFORD offered the following amendment:

In line 9, page 1, after the word "service," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That said silver service shall be subject to recall when, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, it may be of service to the Navy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJUSTMENT OF THE BOUNDARIES OF THE SIUSLAW NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8548, authorizing the adjustment of the boundaries of the Siuslaw National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), section 485, title 16, Code of Lands of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, extended, and made applicable, to any lands within township 12 south, ranges 6 and 7 west, Willamette meridian, Benton County, State of Oregon. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Siuslaw National Forest and subject to all laws relating thereto.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "Lands" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Laws."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INCREASED EXPENDITURES FOR ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACT-LABOR PROVISIONS OF IMMIGRATION LAW

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9598, to authorize increased expenditures for the enforcement of the contractlabor provisions of the immigration law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Oliver] requested me to ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice. He wants to study it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would ask that this bill go to the bottom of the calendar and that it be passed over temporarily.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I will make that request. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be temporarily passed over. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to make a very brief statement. The title makes it appear that this would call for an increased expenditure, but the committee struck the word "increased" from the title, as the bill calls for no increase.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am for the bill, but the gentleman from Alabama desires to study it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to state now that this transfers to the sum authorized in the act of 1917 an additional $100,000 of money already appropriated to be used in the detection of alien criminals who are entering the United States by airplane and otherwise and for breaking up alien gangs of counterfeiters of Government passports and other documents.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think there is any opposition to it. It does not call for any additional appropriation and I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am sorry it can not be passed to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that this bill be passed over temporarily?

There was no objection.

ATTENDANCE OF NAVY BAND AT CONVENTION OF VETERANS OF

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5828, to authorize the attendance of the Navy Band at the convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States at Sacramento, Calif.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, just now I hardly believe it would be advisable to spend $15,838 on such a trip, and I object. Fifteen thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight dollars and eighty-eight cents is not such a large sum, it is true, but the time has now come when we must retrench and stop spending. No matter how much we preach economy, we will never balance the Budget unless we practice economy. There is but one way to practice it, and that is to quit passing bills that appropriate sums of money that are not needed. With regard to all of these bills the first question I ask when taking them up for consideration is, "Can we get along without this; is it necessary?" In my judgment, it is not necessary that this $15,838.88 should be spent; therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

ATTENDANCE OF MARINE BAND AT UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS' CONVENTION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8635, to authorize the attendance of the Marine Band at the United Spanish War Veterans' convention at Milwaukee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the same reason I object. This bill carries over $11,000, or, to be exact, it would cost the people $11,645.08. If we expect to balance the Budget, we must stop spending. We must stop the many small items sought to be appropriated as well as the large ones. While this $11,645.08 is a comparatively small sum, yet when added to the many other items continually appropriated, the aggregate is a large amount during the fiscal year. My opinion is that this money should not be so spent. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND BY UNITED STATES TO THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5603, to authorize the conveyance by the United States to the State of Minnesota of lot 4, section 18, township 131 north, range 29 west, in the county of Morrison, Minn.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey to the State of Minnesota all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to lot 4, section 18, township 131 north, range 29 west, fifth principal meridian, in the county of Morrison, State of Minnesota, formerly a part of Fort Ripley Military Reservation and restored to homestead entry by act of April 1, 1880 (21 Stat. L. 69), for military purposes and specifically as part of Camp Ripley Military Reservation. Such conveyence shall contain the express condition that if said State of Minnesota shall at any time cease to use such lot for such purpose or shall alienate, or attempt to alienate, such lot, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

REHABILITATION OF THE STANFIELD PROJECT, OREGON

The Clerk called up the next bill, H. R. 8164, for the rehabilitation of the Stanfield project, Oregon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Oregon whether this is going to require an expenditure of $100,000?

Mr. BUTLER. The bill authorizes $100,000, or so much as may be necessary, out of the reclamation fund.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think that we can hold this up, this proposed $100,000 expenditure, for a year or so, until we get out of this depression?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, of course it could be held up, and would be held up if the gentleman objects, but not without injury to the settlers and the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. I object. Mr. Speaker.

EQUIPMENT ALLOWANCE TO THIRD-CLASS POSTMASTERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4602, granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present. Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman reserve his objection. We want to make a statement about this important bill

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold my objection.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, the postmasters of this class have to furnish their own equipment for their own offices. This bill provides that inasmuch as that law is in effect the postmasters be allowed 50 per cent of the returns from the box rentals. However, as soon as the Government equips the post offices all the box rentals from the equipment will go to the Government.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. In just a moment.

The fact of the business is that you will find the revenues from these offices will increase somewhat over what the revenue is at the present time. Why? Simply because the postmasters will be entitled to receive 50 per cent of the box rents. Criticize it if you will, but where there is no advantage to the postmaster whatever he is not as apt to push the rental of the boxes as he would if he were entitled to a part of the receipts from the rents, and he will try to rent more boxes and install more boxes and rent them when he gets a part of the return; but if he receives no part of the rental he will be slow to furnish additional boxes at his own expense.

Mr. DYER. Is not this the same bill we had up a few days ago?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; but we want to bring out the merits of this bill, and I hope the gentleman will not object

Mr. DYER. I am not objecting.

Mr. ROMJUE. I want to be fair with the Members of the House. There is only one reason in the world why any Member of the House should have any legitimate reason for being opposed to this bill, in my judgment, and that is if you have any complaint with this bill it must be on the ground that it may take some revenue from the Government. I think if that is your position you have a perfectly legitimate right to object to the bill at this time. If that is the basis on which you put your objection, I shall find no complaint with any man objecting to the bill; but the Government ought to come to this policy finally, and at some time it will do so in fairness to itself and to the postmasters who now have to equip their own offices. When a man is appointed postmaster and the office is turned over to him, there is no reason why the postmaster should equip that office at his own expense, because he has no life tenure on the office and is apt to be there not very long, and then to go out; and if his successor does not choose to purchase his equipment, then it is a total loss in some instances and a heavy partial loss in others, because he has installed something that he has no further use for under the sun when he goes out of office. You might as well say that a road overseer should pay for his own plows and scrapers and road graders.

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. In the case of these third-class postmasters, if they fit up the post office, buy all the equipment, and then a new postmaster is appointed and they can not sell to him, their equipment is a dead loss, is it not?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes; that is true. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. PARKS. And becomes junk.

Mr. ROMJUE. Absolutely; or at least it may become a appeared before our committee or had he time to read the heavy or total loss.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Suppose the landlord owns the equipment-who gets the rent then?

Mr. ROMJUE. If the landlord owns the equipment he has to make some arrangement with the postmaster himself along with the lease, and he is at liberty to agree with the postmaster.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They do not always do it. We allowed them a certain rental here a few years ago, and I know of some postmasters who put the money in their pockets and the landlords got none of it. Why do you not make some provision for the landlord in the case where he owns the equipment?

Mr. ROMJUE. As a matter of fact, if the landlord furnishes the building, and if he chooses to furnish the equipment, he should take care to make a proper contract for rental pay for the equipment by the postmaster or arrange to sell him the equipment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I shall have to object to the bill at this time. If the gentleman will make some provision for the landlords, then I will be with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object, Mr. Speaker. Mr. PATTERSON. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection a moment? There is one other explanation I want

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will withhold it a moment.

Mr. PATTERSON. I just want two minutes to make this explanation to the House with respect to this bill. Every postmaster in the first and second class has his equipment furnished. The fourth-class postmasters are paid an allowance for their equipment, and a part of the third-class postmasters have the equipment furnished them, but the balance of the third-class postmasters have to furnish their own

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman make the statement that the fourth-class postmasters are not required to furnish their equipment?

Mr. PATTERSON. They are required to furnish their equipment, but they have allowance paid to them for rental, heat, and so on.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. They get 15 per cent of their receipts as an allowance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will any member of the Committee on the Post Office state what 50 per cent of these receipts will amount to in a year?

Mr. PATTERSON. Wait a minute. Here is all that is asked for. Part of these postmasters, as I have said, have this equipment furnished them, and the remainder of these third-class postmasters buy their own equipment, rent it out to the box holders, and turn every dollar of this rent over to the department and do not get a cent for it. When the equipment is worn out they have a loss, and the purpose of this bill is to permit them to get one-half of the rentals on their own equipment that they buy.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much will this amount to?

Mr. PATTERSON. It amounts to several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. A million dollars, it has been stated: and in these times when we are going to levy a tax on consumers, is the gentleman in favor of giving $1,000,000 to the postmasters

Mr. PATTERSON. Do you think they ought to be required to buy something and rent it out and turn the receipts back to the Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the ultimate policy of the Government should be to furnish this equipment, but we can not do it at this time.

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe these postmasters are entitled to this relief, and I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin would agree with me if he had heard the witnesses who hearings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I object, Mr. Speaker.

TO DEFER REDUCTIONS IN POST-OFFICE SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS AND EMPLOYEES

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6305, to amend the act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service. readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object-

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman from New York is always in favor of the unemployed. He is sincere in his purpose, and that is the purpose of this bill. A number of post offices have their receipts reduced so that they are going back into a lower class, and when they do they invariably discharge a number of people. The purpose of this bill is to give temporary relief and keep the men from being discharged. It is the same thing that has been done for big business in this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Until this Congress determines where it is going to raise revenue, why should we pass these bills that are costing so much money?

Mr. PATTERSON. This does not cost any extra money. We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $2,000, 000,000 bill, and yet some people try to prevent this most deserved relief to this deserving class of our citizens.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that was to rescue the small banks in the gentleman's State.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope no member of this committee will object to this legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am for economy as strongly as any man in this House, and have, I believe, supported as many economy moves in the last three years as any man in this House, but to kill this bill is not, in my judgment, economy, but its passage would be a splendid relief to a large number of the people who will be out of work if this bill is not enacted into law. I hope those who object to this legislation will study this bill, and that they will see fit later to withdraw their objection.

STANDARDIZATION OF BALE COVERING FOR COTTON

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8559, to provide for the use of net weights in interstate and foreign commerce transactions in cotton, to provide for the standardization of bale covering for cotton, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is one of two bills that I did not have on my list, and I ask that it go over without prejudice.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, may I suggest that if this is to go over for two weeks I have an amendment I would like to have the author consider.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not the author of the bill, but what is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to be helpful, and I am in sympathy with the bill. What I want to suggest is this: On page 3, line 13, after the word "be," insert "of cotton and," so that it will read, "shall be of cotton and of sizes, weights," and so forth, so that regardless of the investigation and regardless of law it provides for a cotton wrapping.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think we would accept that. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

AMENDING THE PENAL LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk read the title of the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 300, to amend section 319 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws | of the United States," approved March 4, 1909.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the Delegate from Alaska or some member of the Committee on Territories whether the District of Alaska has passed through its legislature similar laws relating to the recording of marriage licenses. If the District of Alaska has done like the Territory of Hawaii, then there is no need for this section of the code. It should be stricken out entirely, because the very purpose of the original enactment was that it should apply to Territories. Now, you propose to except the Territory of Hawaii when we have only the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As a member of the Committee on Territories, I will ask that it go over without

Mr. McKEOWN. This bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, and not from the Committee on Territories. I will say, however, that if the Alaska situation is as the gentleman describes he is correct in his assumption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks that the bill go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the interim will the gentleman make inquiry, because there is no need of amending a law that no longer has any effect.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. The Federal judiciary in Alaska is much more extensive, and the Territory is so large it may be necessary in that Territory to carry on registration as it is here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman make inquiry between now and next consent day?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing the bill over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL BUILDING, PONCA CITY, OKLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8075) relating to the construction of a Federal building at Ponca City, Okla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Why is it that this particular building is taken out of the general class and given precedence over all other public buildings?

Mr. CHAVEZ. The money already has been appropriated for the Federal building at Ponca City, Okla., and this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER]. At the time the money was appropriated and the plans were drawn, no provision was made for Federal-court accommodations.

Mr. BLANTON. This is to increase the appropriation from $250,000 to $360,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It will not take any appropriation whatsoever.

Mr. BLANTON. I read from the letter of Acting Secretary Lowman of the Treasury Department:

The proposed change would require an increase in the limit of cost for the project from $250,000 to $360,000.

So you see it is an increase of $100,000. For Ponca City, Okla., that seems to me to be a tremendous increase. Why should we pass this special bill raising it to $350,000? Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is about as much as some pretty good-sized cities get for a building. In any event this splendid little city in Oklahoma should wait until the general bill comes in here making provision for all cities to which buildings have been allocated. In other words, it should take its turn, and come in with the rest. and not ask for this special advantage. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LAWRENCE (MASS.) POST-OFFICE SITE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8907) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire land adjoining the Lawrence (Mass.) post-office site.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the act of Congress approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 899), for extension and remodeling of the post-office building at Lawrence, Mass., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to provide for the acquisition by the Secretary of the Treasury by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of such land adjoining said post-office site as may be needed in connection with said extension; and the unexpended balance of the appropriation for said remodeling and extension shall be available for the acquisition of said additional land.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

LEASING COAL AND ASPHALT DEPOSITS OF CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9496) to provide for the leasing of the segregated coal and asphalt deposits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian Tribes, Oklahoma, and for an extension of time within which purchasers of such deposits may complete payments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve

Give me an opportunity to make a moment's explanation. This bill was introduced at the request of the department. The bill has passed the Senate. The report of the committee substitutes the Senate bill. The Senate bill is on the Speaker's table. The Choctaws and Chickasaws are represented by the governor of the Choctaws and the principal chief of the Chickasaws and their two attorneys. They also have a mining trustee. They are all here in the city. The representatives of the two tribes have gotten together with the department officials, and they have drafted this bill, which is acceptable to every one of them without objection. There is no objection to it from any source. The Indian Office approves it; the Choctaws and the Chickasaws and the tribal attorneys and mining trustee and the coal miners in Oklahoma indorse it. There are about three or four hundred thousand acres of these coal deposits. They have had leases of them. These leases are about to expire, and practically all of them will expire in September next. It is absolutely necessary between now and then to make some provision for the continuance of the leasing of these coal deposits. It is important to those two tribes. It does not affect anybody else. Everyone in that section is agreeable to the provisions of this bill. The departmental officials appeared at a hearing before the Indian Committee the other day and orally stated that it was entirely agreeable to them and asked that a favorable report be made upon it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Who are the lessees?

Mr. HASTINGS. The lessees are people who are leasing the coal deposits in Oklahoma.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Are not they the real beneficiaries?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no. The Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes are the beneficiaries. Practically all of these leases are terminated in September.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Have they been paid their current leases?

Mr. HASTINGS. Some of them have, and this provides for collections.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It provides for collections?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. It provides for adjustment in making certain collections that are agreeable under these depressed times to the representatives of the tribes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If it is for the benefit of the Indians, of course, I would not object.

Mr. HASTINGS. They are the ones who are pressing it. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF FLINT RIVER, ALA, AND TENN.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 9451, to provide a preliminary examination of the Flint River, Ala. and Tenn., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I believe we ought to decide, as a matter of policy, whether these surveys on floods are to come up in this way on the Consent Calendar. I believe we will be absolutely swamped with bills of this kind. It is impossible to go into details of them. They are not like general legislation where we have an opportunity to be informed about them. There is no way to find out about local conditions. I have no objection to the bill on its merits, but I believe that we should not encourage bills of this kind on the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object to these bills for the time being.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. ALMON. I just want to say that this merely provides for a preliminary survey. It will not cost anything; and, if the survey is made, it may be a permanent survey or it may not. It is for the purpose of flood control. It had the unanimous approval of the Committee on Flood Control, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Until we find where we will get the funds for future flood control, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF FLINT CREEK AND ITS BRANCHES IN MORGAN COUNTY, ALA.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 9452, to provide a preliminary examination of Flint Creek and its branches in Morgan County, Ala., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF CATACO CREEK AND ITS BRANCHES IN MORGAN COUNTY, ALA.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 9453, to provide a preliminary examination of Cataco Creek and its branches in Morgan County, Ala., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

APPROVAL OF GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE SEMINOLE TRIBE FOR DISPOSAL OF TRIBAL LAND

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 10362, to require the approval of the General Council of the Seminole Tribe or Nation in case of the disposal of any tribal land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this seems to be a harmless bill, but I was wondering whether a bill of this importance should not be considered when the Committee on Indian Affairs has its day on Calendar Wednesday, in the near future?

Mr. McKEOWN. They asked us to bring it in. There is just a little property of this poor old Seminole Tribe left. The committee heard the case thoroughly. This is to prevent them from selling their property. It is a very meritorious bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand from reading the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the commission does not intend to dispose of the rights anyway.

Mr. McKEOWN. For the present. He will not say that he will not do it in the future. The feeling of the members of the committee was that as soon as Congress adjourned, he might proceed to sell the lands.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the bill to tie up the disposition of these rights for all time?

Mr. McKEOWN. No, no; until he is ready to be heard on the sale of his property.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall not sell, lease, encumber, or in any manner dispose of, any land or any interest in land belonging to the Seminole Tribe or Nation in Oklahoma or reserved for the benefit of such tribe, except with the approval of the Seminole Tribe or Nation acting through its general council selected in pursuance of Seminole customs.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF PORTION OF UNITED STATES RANGE LIVESTOCK EXPERIMENT STATION, MONTANA

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8923, authorizing transfer of an unused portion of the United States Range Livestock Experiment Station, Montana, to the State of Montana for use as a fish-cultural station, game reserve, and public recreation ground, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Leavitt] whether he has any objection, or the State of Montana has any objection, to paying for this land at the appraised value when it is turned over by the National Government?

Mr. LEAVITT. The only objection is the difficulty of securing an appropriation through the State legislature. It would have to be raised locally among the people, and it goes from one public purpose to another.

Mr. STAFFORD. But we are establishing a precedent here.

Mr. LEAVITT. But I will say to the gentleman that has already been established.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then we are extending the precedent, if that is the case. The policy of the National Government should be, when it has no further need for property, to give preference in the transfer to the States or some subdivision thereof

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, I can not have any objection. If the gentleman wants to amend it, I will not oppose the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I could not consistently allow this bill to go through without an amendment.

Mr. DYER. Is the property worth something?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no knowledge of that. There may be improvements or there may not be.

Mr. LEAVITT. I shall not oppose the gentleman's amendment, although the committee thought that passing from one public service to another there should be no charge.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may say to the gentleman that the Committee on Military Affairs has the same proposition before it, and that is the position that some of us are taking.

With the understanding that that amendment will be accepted, I will not offer any objection.

Mr. GOSS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. speaker, has the amendment which the commissioner suggested been offered to this bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. The bill has been rewritten in that language.

Mr. GOSS. And it carried the suggested amendment?

Mr. LEAVITT. Except it left out the $1.25 per acre.

Mr. GOSS. That was what they recommended.

Mr. LEAVITT. They recommended $1.25 an acre.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Interior, upon agreement of the Secretary of Agriculture, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the State of Montana, for use as a fish-cultural station, game reserve, public recreation ground, and similar purposes, lot 10 of section 3 and lot 9 of section 4, township 7 north, range 47 east, and lot 15 of section 33 and lot 4 of section 34, township 8 north, range 47 east, Montana principal meridian, containing approximately 122.98 acres and now being an unused portion of the United States Range Livestock Experiment Station.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 15, 1924 (43 Stat. 99), in so far as said act places under the control of the Department of Agriculture the lands described as lot 10, section 3, and lot 9, section 4, township 7 north, range 47 east, and lot 15, section 33, and lot 4, section 34, township 8 north, range 47 east, Montana principal meridian, containing approximately 122.98 acres, be hereby repealed, and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to the State of Montana for the lands hereinbefore described for use as a fish-cultural station, game reserve, public recreation ground, and similar purposes, with a reservation to the United States of all coal, oil, gas, and other minerals, together with the right of the United States, its grantees, or permittees, to prospect for, mine, and remove the same."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 15, after the word "to," insert the words "have an appraisal made thereof and upon payment of the appraisal price, to."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Stafford: Amend the committee amendment, on page 2, line 15, after the word "to," where it occurs the first time, and insert the following: "have an appraisal made thereof and upon payment of the appraisal price, to."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXEMPTION FROM THE QUOTA OF FATHERS AND MOTHERS OVER 60 YEARS OF AGE OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8174, to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PERKINS, Mr. GREEN, and Mr. STAFFORD objected.

AMENDMENT OF THE SIXTH EXCEPTION IN SECTION 3 OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8766, to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 with reference to nonimmigration status of certain aliens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. PATTERSON objected.

AMENDMENT OF THE ACT AUTHORIZING THE WICHITA AND AFFIL-IATED BANDS OF INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA TO SUBMIT CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1719, amending the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians in Oklahoma to submit claims to the Court of Claims," approved June 4, 1924.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXPENDITURES FOR THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE CONTRACT-LABOR PROVISIONS OF THE IMMIGRATION LAW

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9598) to authorize increased expenditures for the enforcement of the contract-labor provisions of the immigration law, which was temporarily laid aside. I have conferred with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], and he has no objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9598, which was temporarily laid aside. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much of an expenditure will this amount to?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. None at all.

Mr. DYER. Does it involve any money at all?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, it involves the expenditure of an additional $100,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The title as shown on the calendar is misleading. The committee amended the title so that the word "increased" is stricken out. What the bill does is to permit the transfer of funds already appropriated to be added to the $100,000 authorized in section 24 of the immigration act of 1917, under which that money is used for the enforcement of the contract-labor provisions of the immigration law, and certain other provisions of that law. That money is now needed in the worst way in order to take necessary steps toward the breaking up of these gangs of alien smugglers.

Mr. DYER. Unless this bill is passed that money can not be used?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It will be used in the department. The present law fixes the amount at $100,000 for that purpose, and this permits $200,000. We are not asking any more money than that which has already been appropriated.

Mr. DYER. Then it does involve more money.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All money for the Immigration Service is provided in a lump sum. The basic law specifies that $100,000 of that lump sum shall be used for the enforcement of the contract-labor provisions of the immigration law and certain other provisions of that law. This transfers $100,000 from the lump sum to the uses provided for in section 24 of the immigration act of 1917.

Mr. STAFFORD. An additional $100,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is a fund which is used for the enforcement of the contract-labor provisions of the immigration law. It does not take another new dollar, and it will break up these gangs of alien smugglers. Twenty or thirty were arrested in Buffalo a few weeks ago, many others in Chicago, and some in Detroit. They are being indicted and convicted.

Mr. DYER. I will not oppose this legislation if I have the assurance of the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Alabama that this will not mean an additional burden upon the Government, but as far as any additional burdens on the Government are concerned I propose to object until the Congress enacts revenue legislation to take care of obligations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would be with the gentleman if that was what the bill did, but it does not.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the gentleman will permit, I will read the bill, as it is very short:

That section 24 of the immigration act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 874), is amended by striking out the figures "$100,000" where they appear in said section and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$200,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Which sum is already in the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I might add, if the gentleman will permit, that this $100,000 has been in the act of 1917 and is to carry out the purposes of the act of 1883.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Exactly; the contractlabor provision of that date.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they are circumscribed so as to be limited to $100,000.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

is that they are using the Immigration Service to ferret out every little offender and harass him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But now they are after the big alien criminals and have made a mighty good start. Mr. STAFFORD. No; I think they are abusing their power in many cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is limited to contract labor and to people unlawfully coming into the United States.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman will permit, I can assure the gentleman I have given this matter very careful consideration. The Secretary of Labor has been before the committee in executive session, and his facts have been properly presented. I recommended that this bill pass, and I can assure the gentleman that the money is not going to be used as indicated by him, because I am opposed to that very thing myself.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask how this money is to be used and who is to get the money?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No one is to get this money. It is in the department appropriation and has been appropriated. Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have the original act here and can read it to the gentleman:

That the Secretary in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers and induced and assisted immigrants may employ for such purposes and for detail upon additional service under this act when not so engaged, without reference to the provisions of the said civil service act or various acts relating to the compilation of the official registers, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $100,000—

And the bill increases that to $200,000.

Mr. PARKS. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker. There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 24 of the immigration act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 874), is amended by striking out the figures "$100,000" where they appear in said section and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$200,000."

With the following committee amendment:

Amend the title to read as follows: "A bill to authorize expendithe enforcement of the contract-labor provisions of the immigration law.'

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

RELIEF OF WATER USERS ON IRRIGATION PROJECTS

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3706) for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects constructed and operated under the reclamation law.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3706, with Mr. Keller in the

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I recall the parliamentary situation, this bill by unanimous consent was given a privileged status and was called up on a former occasion, and general debate was pursued for a few minutes and then it was found that they could not proceed further on account of the expiration of the time on that day. Will the general debate that was had on the bill be counted as a part of the one hour that the proponents of the bill had?

The CHAIRMAN. It will. Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, how much time was consumed in debate on that occasion?

The CHAIRMAN. The remaining time is divided as follows: The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] has 52

Mr. STAFFORD. The condition I find in my own city | minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Hall] has 15 minutes

> Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] might be in a frame of mind to-day to cut down on general debate in order that we may get some action

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to assure the gentleman from Alabama I do not intend to take up all the time at my disposal, although I could readily do so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am of a disposing mind to-day.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill was under consideration on the last occasion, considerable opposition was manifested, particularly to one provision, that, as to these deferred payments and charges, no interest charge was to be levied against the recipients of the Government's favor. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] not only once but more than three times justified the passage of this moratorium on the ground that we had just granted 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the poor people of the country, and this established a precedent for giving away further money.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at present.

The gentleman stated then that this would not cost the Government one cent of money. As I stated to the gentleman from Alabama, I am in a disposing mood to pass this legislation. I think it is only fair to the committee to set forth just what this does as a moratorium for a year and a half. It is more than that-it also suspends the payment that the Reclamation Service is bound to pay back into the Treasury, beginning July 1, 1932, of $2,000,000, until July 1.

Since this bill has been under consideration there have been some conferences between those who violently oppose the bill, primarily because it did not carry any provision for interest on deferred payments, these opponents believing it would set up a dangerous precedent if that policy were established; that we could not justify charging interest to the poor farmers when we loan them money for seed with a lien on their crops if we should allow these persons having water rights on irrigation projects to be relieved of payment of interest when payment of the annual installment is

So there has been an understanding so far as the interest is concerned, and amendments will be proposed to carry that agreement out.

On page 2, line 9, strike out the language: "No interest or penalty shall be payable on that portion of the charges herein authorized to be deferred," and insert in lieu thereof "and otherwise the deferred payments herein authorized shall bear interest until paid at such rate and shall be paid at such times as the Sec-retary of the Interior shall determine."

That is for the purpose of having these deferred interest payments bear interest until such times as may be agreed upon between the water users and the Secretary of the

Another amendment, suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], is at the end of section 1:

Page 2, line 18: "And provided further, That the payments for construction charges and interest payments on the cost of the power systems referred to in this act shall not be deemed waived, but only deferred, and shall be paid in the manner set forth in section 4 of this act."

Section 3 relates to the construction projects, both in Colorado-the Uncompangre reclamation project and the Grand Valley reclamation project. It is proposed to strike out the clause "without interest and penalty," and add at the end of the section the following:

Under the terms as provided in this act.

Again, carrying out the same idea, section 6, line 3, at the end of the line insert:

The rate of interest to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

That carries out the former idea.

Now, section 9, it is proposed to strike out the words "6 per cent per annum."

The last amendment is vital, and it is to strike out "1935" and insert "1934," so that the annual payments of $2,000,000 to the Treasury will begin July 1, 1934, instead of 1935.

I realize that all legislation is a compromise. The Commissioner of Reclamation in his testimony before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on the Interior Department bill, page 87, et seq., very strongly opposed this moratorium. In view of the request of certain Members who oppose the bill, I have taken upon myself to study the hearings before the Senate committee. I gave special consideration to the hearings relating to the projects in the district of the gentleman from Texas, a Rio Grande project. Those hearings disclose what was a good case. It affected nearly 80 per cent of all of the users of that project.

The department takes the position that we are establishing a dangerous precedent of having the National Government act merely as a ward to all of these person who cultivate the soil on irrigation projects.

I think the Commissioner of Irrigation sets forth the arguments in support of that position very strongly. I do not wish to contest this legislation, though I would feel impelled to vote against it and to strongly oppose it if these amendments I have suggested were not accepted. Those who are strongly in favor of the bill, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Hall], the two gentlemen from Idaho [Mr. Smith and Mr. French], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Simmons], the two gentlemen from Washington [Mr. Johnson and Mr. Summers], the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. Arentz], and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Carter], are favorable to the acceptance of these amendments as being meritorious. Unless there is further request for time, I shall reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A moratorium act is not a pleasant thing, but I make the prediction that before a year is gone there will be more moratorium acts upon the part of the Federal Government in respect to payments to the Federal Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question but that this is a most dangerous precedent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is necessary, and still other moratoriums will be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifty per cent of those occupying the land are in a position not only to pay but they have paid. It is only another illustration of Government paternalism. When we get into Government operation then these people appeal to Uncle Sam for gratuities and continued gratuities. Here is a Reclamation Service that does not pay any interest on these millions and millions of dollars that the Government has advanced to it. We have voted a $9,000,000 subsidy already to this Reclamation Service.

We are deferring for a year and a half the payments due under the law, but we are requiring by these proposed amendments that they shall pay interest at such rates as the Secretary determines, and we have now with these amendments a harmonized bill. While it may in the future be a perplexing precedent against us, I think under the circumstances the bill should be passed to provide for the ne'erdo-wells who are cultivating the land, who have big loans with farm-loan banks, who have taxes unpaid, and who asked to be let off from the water charges so that they will be able to pay the banks and their taxes. This bill is largely for the benefit of the banks who have mortgages and claims against these projects in that it relieves the users of the obligation to pay the Government under the existing contracts.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. What the gentleman has been saying is true in a measure, but has not every measure that we have enacted here for the relief situation been in favor of the banking interests and the larger interests all the way through?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. The benefits were designed to seep through ultimately for the benefit of the people generally.

Mr. PARSONS. That is what this does.

Mr. STAFFORD. We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill primarily for the relief of small banks in the Southern and Western States that were on the verge of bankruptcy. That Finance Corporation has come to the rescue of those banks and it is saving the depositors and the communities. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to the amendments proposed by the gentleman. I ask now that the bill be read for amendment.

Mr. MILLARD. Before that is done will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLARD. A statement was made that some of the people could pay. Is there any provision in the bill to compel them to pay?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Secretary of the Interior and the Director of Reclamation took the position that we should not come to the rescue of those who are able to pay and who have paid. This bill comes to the aid of all.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The interest charge will operate to cause those farmers who can pay, to pay the charges. Perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. Mnlard] did not understand the effect of the amendments proposed. Those who have the money to pay the annual charges can be depended upon not to undertake the obligation of having to pay the charges and interest in addition thereto.

Perhaps the gentleman does not understand that the basis of this reclamation fund is from the proceeds of the sales of public lands from Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming. At page 166 of the 1931 report of the Secretary of the Interior it is stated that $110,957,828 proceeds from the sale of public lands were placed in and amount to 41.4 per cent of the reclamation funds. Forty million seven hundred and thirty-six thousand two hundred and fifty-six dollars have been placed in the reclamation fund from the royalties received for mineral leasing and power licenses. This is 15.2 per cent of the fund; every dollar has been produced out of the land of the reclamation States. There appears to be $17,582,746 in special appropriation and unpaid Treasury loans, or 6.7 per cent of the fund. The balance of the fund, consisting of $99,006,720, or 36.9 per cent, has been paid back in the fund by collections from the settlers.

When you consider that $206,041,522 has been spent in the construction of these projects and realize that the settlers have paid back practically $100,000,000, you immediately realize how serious the situation is when they ask for a moratorium to permit the less fortunate to continue operating their lands. That construction cost 76.8 per cent of the total amount spent; the operation and maintenance during all these years has taken 16.4 per cent of the total, $44,067,641. Incidental operation and other items, $13,301,440, make 6 per cent of the amount spent, and on June 30, 1931, there was available 1.8 per cent of the total collections up to that date for the use during the current year. The amount was $4,872,947. I can not tell how much of it is left to-day for maintenance and construction costs on existing projects.

Remember that practically every cent of this $268,283,550 has come out of the pockets of the project settlers, the sale of public lands, and the royalties from oil produced in some of the reclamation States. Remember that every project settler is bound to pay the balance upon his contract for his land and water and has no land title upon which he can make an ordinary farm loan. And then think that there are only 1,550,967 acres in the total acreage in all the Federal irrigation projects. Why, in the State of Colorado we have 12 counties, in each of which there is a bigger acreage.

I submit that neither the gentleman from New York [Mr. Millard] nor his colleague [Mr. Taber] nor the other gentlemen who evidenced concern over this bill realized what the actual financial situation is as disclosed by the foregoing facts. Every forecast of any kind of business would indicate that every single settler who can find the money to pay his annual charges would do so and thus save an additional interest charge upon the amount. It is an omnibus bill that will be availed of by all.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is fair to say that perhaps the interest charge will deter the progressive up-to-date farmers on these lands from taking advantage of the moratorium, because they will have to pay some time or other. If they have the money they would rather have the mortgage paid off and the charges paid off than to pay interest perhaps

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not like the reference which the gentleman from Wisconsin slurringly made to the farmers when he called them "ne'er-do-wells."

Some of the Members here who do not live in Milwaukee know that the farmers are the backbone of this Nation. It is true that they have gone through this depression, with other citizens, and, in addition to that, they have gone through, in some places, three years of continuous drought preceding the past year, when they did make a good crop and could not get anything for it. Nothing has been done of any consequence in this Congress for the farmers of the Nation. We thought we were helping them when we gave the Secretary of Agriculture a fund to make loans to them this year. I am in receipt of letters and telegrams during the past few days and this morning, from my district, showing that the Secretary of Agriculture, under Mr. Warburton. has required of every farmer seeking a loan in Texas, a contract requiring such farmer to reduce his cotton crop one-third.

From the printed Regulations Relative to Loans for Crop Production During the Year 1932, dated February 10, 1932. and signed by Hon. Arthur M. Hyde, Secretary of Agriculture, and which control in making all loans to farmers for crop production, I quote the following paragraph:

No loan will be made to any individual or to the tenants or share croppers of any landlord to finance or assist in financing the planting of an acreage of cotton or tobacco in excess of 65 per cent of the acreage of such crops planted by such individual or by the tenants or share croppers of such landlord in the spring of 1931, and unless such individual or landlord agrees that he will not have any interest whatsoever in any such crops in excess of 65 per cent of the acreage of such crops to which he had an interest in 1931: Provided, That the foregoing shall not apply to the farmer, tenant, or share cropper who, in 1931, planted not more than 10 acres of cotton or 3 acres of tobacco

I have just received the above this morning from Hon. T. N. Carswell, secretary, chamber of commerce, of my home city of Abilene, Tex., stating that farmers are required to put the above provision in their contracts, agreed to by their landlords, where they are renters, agreeing to reduce their cotton crop one-third of what it was in 1931, and that such requirement was tantamount to a denial of all loans to farmers, for they had already reduced their acreage for 1931, and to again reduce it one-third would be ruinous, as cotton is their money crop.

Under such bureau requirements, if a farmer had planted only 101/2 acres of cotton for 1931, he is required to reduce such small acreage one-third for 1932 in order to get a loan.

What authority has been given to Mr. Secretary Hyde to demand a contract requiring a farmer to reduce his crop at least one-third? Congress did not so authorize him. Congress, when providing this money, authorized crop loans to be made to farmers. That will not help him. The farmers will not be able to do that, and they are thereby deprived of any loan or of any help whatever. They are not getting the loans that we intended for them, and I want to say that Secretary Hyde and his administrator, Mr. Warburton, are not carrying out the will of Congress when they are denying loans to farmers because they will not kowtow to them and get down on their knees and accept any kind of a proposition they demand of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman vield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington, because he does not call the farmers "ne'er-do-wells."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think they are most unfortunate, particularly those who have been inveigled recently onto homesteads or reclamation projects; but the trouble with the loan business seems to be that the landlord can not agree with the tenant as to how they shall mortgage the crop. The tenant wants to make a loan in order to make a crop and the landlord himself does not give it.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not altogether the case. We have no such trouble in Texas. There is only a certain per cent of the farmers who are compelled to make loans. Other farmers who are not compelled to make loans are not going to be controlled by the Secretary of Agriculture in Washington as to the amount of crop that they shall plant, and therefore the regulation that he has put into effect to reduce acreage on certain crops, like cotton, will not become effective and will avail nothing. He is preventing the farmers all over a great portion of the United States from getting any loans at all because they can not comply with the terms of the contract demanded.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield. Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman knows that in the law it is stated they can not get a loan if they do increase their

Mr. BLANTON. That is all right. But the farmers are not trying to increase. We did not say that they must agree to reduce their crops. Mr. Secretary Hyde is requiring them to reduce their crops one-third before he will give them a loan.

Mr. HOPKINS. No; but we did limit it.
Mr. BLANTON. We limited it only by requiring them not to increase. That is as far as the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have gone-within the limitation fixed by Congress-but he has not done that. He and Mr. Warburton require them to agree to reduce their crop acreage one-third. I am going to put into the RECORD in connection with my remarks that entire provision of the contract partly quoted by me, which shows they are demanding of the farmers right now that they reduce their acreage one-third. They have no right to do it. I make a public demand of the Secretary of Agriculture that he conform to the will of Congress expressed in the act we passed when providing this money in the promulgation of his contract and his regulations and that he not require that the farmers shall do what Congress did not intend.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any irrigation district, water-users' sociation, or other water-users' organization under contract association, or other association, or other water-users organization that with the United States for payment of construction charges under the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 383), or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, including the act of February 21, 1911 (36 Stat. 923) (upon acceptance of this act by resoary 21, 1911 (36 Stat. 923) (upon acceptance of this act by resolution of its board of directors or corresponding body), shall be required to make no payment on the regular construction charge for the calendar year 1931, and in lieu of the regular installment of construction charge provided for under existing contracts may pay for the calendar year 1932 on the basis of 50 per cent of the amount which for this act would be payable under said contracts, such amount to be computed and determined for that year in the manner provided in said contracts and the law year in the manner provided in said contracts and the law applicable thereto. Interest and penalty as now provided by law and contracts for nonpayments when due shall apply on all charges for 1932 adjusted as herein authorized. No interest or penalty shall be payable on that portion of the charges herein authorized to be deferred: Provided, That in determining the rate for the sale of power during the irrigation season of 1931 to irrigation districts from any power plant operated by the Bureau of Reclamation interest on the cost of the power system shall not be included as an element, but interest at the rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent per annum shall be included as an element of such rate for the sale of power to such districts during the irrigation season of 1932.

Mr. STAFFORD offered the following amendment:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "authorized," strike out the period and the words "no interest or penalty shall be payable on that portion of the charges herein authorized to be deferred" and insert a semicolon and the following words: "And otherwise deferred payments herein authorized shall bear interest until paid, at such rate and shall be paid at such times as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER offered the following amendment at the end of the paragraph:

Page 2, line 18, after the figures "1932," strike out the period, insert a semicolon and the following: "And provided further, That the payments for construction charges and interest payments for the cost of the power systems referred to in this act shall not be deemed waived, but only deferred, and shall be paid in the manner set forth in section 4 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. On projects or divisions of projects where no irrigation SEC. 2. On projects or divisions of projects where no irrigation district, water-users' association, or other water-users' organization has assumed joint obligation for payment of construction charges individual water-right applicants or entrymen upon acceptance of this act in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, shall be required to make no payment on the regular construction charge for the calendar year 1931, and in lieu of the installments payable under existing contracts, may pay their regular installments of construction charges for the calendar year 1932 on the same basis as that authorized in section 1 hereof for districts, associations, and other water-users' organizations.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the House to contracts made in lending the seed-loan funds to farmers. I do this in connection with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton], who pointed out the inequities of these contracts a few minutes ago. I recall that quite a number of us-and probably the gentleman was among that group saw the Secretary of Agriculture before these contracts were finally issued. We pointed out the danger in making the kind of contract they now have, as the gentleman from Texas has pointed out. I think that most of us will agree with him that under the law the Secretary is at least stretching a point when he requires such a contract with the farmers. Then, it seems to me there is another danger in that kind of a contract, and it is especially true of my section, as it may be in all of the sections represented by the Members of this House. I think most of us agree that the southern farmers should reduce their cotton crops, and that if the Secretary of Agriculture puts this in the contract, so few will get the benefit of it that the others who do not need it will go ahead and increase their crops and thus defeat the very thing we wish for and need so much.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. As the gentleman knows, the farmers who will get loans from the Government will be few as compared to other farmers engaged in the same kind of crop production. Now, if the Secretary of Agriculture requires a few who need loans to agree to reduce their crops he would simply make them "the goat," because the ones who do not need loans and who are not under any restrictions at all will naturally increase their acreage, and they will produce much greater crops than they otherwise would.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is what we pointed out to the Secretary. We questioned then, and I do now, the legal right of the Secretary of Agriculture to do it, and the doing of it will in all probability have the result which the gentleman from Texas has just pointed out. In that very meeting I, along with other Members, pointed out this very danger.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Warburton ought to rescind his action of requiring this restriction to go in their contracts.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Secretary after this meeting did not go further, for if there was ever a time when the farmer needs help and leniency it is now.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, for the purpose of saying I heartily indorse what has just been said in opposition to the red tape which the Department of Agriculture is wrapping about the production loans which Congress authorized for the farmers of the Nation.

Scores of telegrams and letters reach my office every day complaining of the unfair tactics which the department is using in connection with these loans. Once and twice a day I am taking these complaints up with the department. Several changes have been promised, and yet the situation is nothing short of outrageous.

Congress intended that these loans be made to certain farmers, and the Department of Agriculture ignores and overrides the will of Congress and provides that the loans shall only be made to such farmers as the department selects after it puts them through a sweating process of a specially concocted third degree.

Is this department, intended for the farmers, to become the department of aggravation, with an extermination service specially set up for use on the unfortunate farmers? It is certainly succeeding in aggravating and exterminating the

During all these years millions and millions have been spent by the department in urging the farmers in every way possible to produce more abundantly, and now the department is persecuting the farmers for following this advice.

Approximately one-third of the department's time is now taken up madly trying to undo what the department has been trying to do all these years. Another third is used doing over poorly what has already been done, and the rest of the time is used devising means to thwart the will of Congress and carry forward the further enslaving of the farmers of the Nation.

God knows Congress does far too little for the farmer. and now for the farmer to be subjected to all the plagues devised by this department is simply adding outrageous insult to the already unfair burdens of these noble people of the farm.

The Department of Agriculture has set itself up as a lawmaking body and is promulgating rules and laws in defiance of all laws of decency and in the teeth of the Federal Constitution.

A law enacted by the State legislature or Congress can be tested by the courts and set aside if unconstitutional. Not so with these departmental requirements, for the farmers must yield to the unjust requirements if he is to get his loan in time to make his crop. He is simply held up and must sign on the dotted line or suffer the threatened dire consequences of punishment to be borne by him and by his wife and children.

The farmer can no more appeal the unfair rule of this department than a father or mother can appeal the kidnaping of their child. The kidnaper demands ransom in exchange for the safety of the child. The department demands the surrender of the constitutional rights of the farmers and the abject abandonment of liberties dear to the heart of every free American in exchange for a paltry reloan of money already taxed out of the farmer. Both are unfair and the act of either a criminal or a person acting without due regard for the rights of others. Neither outrage is subject to appeal to a tribunal of justice. Both are enforced by the fear of punishment of innocent women and children.

If the Department of Agriculture was abolished, most of the farmers of the Nation would only know it by finding that they are annoyed less or by seeing the news item.

Speaking of consolidation of bureaus and departments, I suggest that if the Department of Agriculture is to continue its fight on the farmers, then this department should be abolished and its activities handled by the War Department. The name would not be so misleading. The farmers would at least know what to expect.

I may suggest, though, that there would be very little or make some valuable modifications, and I regret that he did nothing to transfer, if Congress would only eliminate all the efforts of this department to undo what it has done, do over without improvement what it has already done, and to do what it should never do.

Certain it is that there would be no necessity for spending millions and millions of money to build one of the largest and most expensive office buildings in the world for this department as is now being done. If the activities just mentioned were eliminated, there would be only about three left, and to my mind all of these are among those which should never occur.

The Secretary very probably would want to continue to give out erroneous crop and other reports and thus drive down the prices of farm products; give out statements that the farmers are very prosperous and extremely happy and furthermore endeavor to convince the public that the Federal Farm Board act is perfect and that the Federal Farm Board should be retained without any amendment to this act. If these three unfair and unnecessary activities just had to be carried on at Government cost, this little job could be done in one little room, by one little man, at very little expense.

It is hard to be temperate in thought and language when one realizes just what has been done and is now being done under the reconstruction finance act for the great corporations of the country and the unfair deal that is being given the farmers under the same act.

Just here let me say there are in the Department of Agriculture and the extension service some of the most splendid men and women I ever saw. They are truly friends of the farmers of the Nation. Many of them are among the best friends I have on earth. I am not criticizing them. I am criticizing, though, those officials who purposely and deliberately make it so difficult for the farmers to get any real good out of anything Congress attempts to do for them. I resent as unfair any effort on the part of the department to force the borrowers of the little production loans to make curtailments of acreage of any crop unless that same curtailment scheme is voluntarily made and entered into by the rich as well as the poor and the big farmer who does not borrow as well as the poor borrower.

I repeat, I have no objection to the farmers signing any cropping plan they may wish to make. I am most anxious though that there be no unnecessary delay of loan applications on this account, and for this reason I urged the Department of Agriculture not to take cropping-plan contracts in connection with the applications for loans. I feel these ought to be disconnected altogether from the applications for loans, as I do not want the Department of Agriculture to embark on a program of attempting to control every activity of the farmer under a threat, either actual or implied, that he would not receive his loan or other help from the Government unless he executed a cropping plan or any other paper curtailing the liberties of the borrower to a greater extent than is imposed by law on the man who does not borrow.

I feel that to force the borrower to curtail his acreage in this manner, while the man who does not borrow increases his will not at all solve the so-called overproduction problem, but on the contrary will not only complicate it, but will also become a precedent for what in my mind is a very unfair system. Many months ago I made my position clear to the Department of Agriculture, that I should oppose in every way possible forcing the unfortunate farmers of the country who borrow, to curtail their acreage unless a system could be worked out which would also bring about a similar curtailment by the larger planters who do not obtain any loans from the Government.

I may repeat, though, that I am not making any fight on the obtaining of these production plans where executed voluntarily and disconnected with the aid given the farmers by these production loans so that the farmer will be exercising the fullest freedom in executing these production contracts or promises.

Any effort to control production is wrong unless it oper- vote to put this additiona ates evenly and equally on the rich and the poor and on all | bended and broken backs.

the farmers, not of only one section or State, but of the whole Nation. The present device used by the Department of Agriculture to control the acreage of cotton and tobacco is unfair and vicious for another reason.

As soon as the Department of Agriculture succeeds in forcing a reduction of acreage on my farmers the department through the press, the radio, and in every way possible, will broadcast to the rest of the Nation an exaggerated report of the enforced curtailment or reduction of acreage and thus invite a much greater production of tobacco and cotton by the tobacco growers and producers, especially those of wealth of the whole country who do not borrow from the Government.

Thus this department enslaves the poor farmer, curtails not only his production but his price in behalf of the rich growers of the whole Nation. The poor farmer is forced to cut acreage and the farmers of the whole country who do not borrow from the Government are graciously invited to accordingly increase their acreage.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman believe that the statements just made by him tend to prove the danger of continually extending the Federal activities to this, that, and everything under the sun?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It creates more and more red tape, more delay, and more Federal employees.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Especially where the Government does so much and creates so many bureaus for everybody else but the farmers, and when something is to be done for the farmers there is so much red tape they get absolutely nothing out of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, it matters not whether a law is enacted in the name of the farmer or not, in the end he does not get a square deal. Something is sure to be wrong, either in the act as worded, in the administration of it, or in its final effect. This certainly is true of all bills passed in the name of the farmer and all tax or revenue proposals.

It may not be amiss for me at this time to say a few words about the proposed general sales tax now under consideration. As I have repeatedly said on this floor and elsewhere, I am unreservedly and unalterably opposed to the principle of this system of taxation. It is contrary to all other principles of raising revenue.

It taxes poverty instead of wealth; the need for the necessaries of life instead of ownership of property; hunger and want instead of luxuries and riotous living; losses and misfortune instead of income and profits; those who get the least out of the Government instead of those who get the most, and those least able to pay instead of those most able to pay.

Many exemptions are being proposed. I favor many more. In fact, I hope every article needed by our people for any proper purpose may be eventually excepted or exempted and that then the general sales tax principle be overwhelmingly defeated.

No amount of exemptions will cause me to vote for a principle which I feel is as vicious as a general sales tax. If the sales-tax principle is ever ingrafted upon our Federal taxing system, the camel's nose will be in the tent and a mighty drive will be made to eliminate the income tax and all forms of taxing wealth and to raise all funds for Federal purposes by this tax, excise taxes, and the tariff system. This Congress to this good hour has not passed a single general law in behalf of the masses who are suffering most as the result of this depression. I certainly shall not now vote to put this additional unconscionable burden on their bended and broken backs.

The war cry is, the Budget must be balanced. I am more alarmed about budging the balance than about not balancing

If the deficit in the Treasury was caused by appropriations saving the homes of my farmers and ushering in the return of prosperity for all my people, I would feel that they could afford to be taxed by any fair means with the rest of the Nation to raise the necessary money, but this is not the CASE

This very Congress appropriated $500,000,000 to be dished out by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Wall Street bankers. This amount is about what would be raised by this sales tax in one year. But this is not all; this same act made $2,000,000,000 available for loans to these Wall Street banks and monopolies. It would take four years to raise this money by this sales tax.

Think of it, the advocates of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation wanted that act so worded that the entire amount that could be raised by this sales tax could and would be loaned to only three big corporations, and yet we, as Representatives of our bleeding, dying people, are asked to raise these millions upon millions of dollars by taxing the poorest of the poor a few cents here and yonder and everywhere from everybody and a few dollars here and yonder and everywhere from everybody until the sum runs into millions and millions of tribute to be dumped into the vaults that are already busting with hoarded billions of ill-gotten wealth.

They seek to raise this money by squeezing the very last dollar, nickel, and penny from the impoverished, hungry, freezing, homeless, jobless, and outraged poor of the land, to be turned over in $100,000,000 sums to the very international bankers who wanted and secured the foreign-debt cancellation and moratorium program for their own outrageous, selfish, diabolical interest, who now are hoarding the money of the Nation and causing the most awful depression since the beginning of time; who have originated, sponsored, and secured the passage of every big financial or banking piece of legislation in behalf of the rich during the last several decades and who are now engaged in a campaign to get both the Democratic and Republican Parties to put over this system of sales tax as an entering wedge to relieve wealth of all Federal taxes and to place the entire burden on the backs of the millions of the poor.

Mr. Chairman, I thank God and the good people of my district for the privilege as their Representative of voting against any such scheme.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, why should we have any Congress or any committees, if we are to put over only such program as is outlined by the Wall Street interests?

Mr. Chairman, if all these outrages are to be perpetrated by Congress without protest and if the definite program is for the Wall Street interests, to tell the President, the President tell the Democratic and Republican leaders, and leaders tell the Members of Congress, and the Members are to, more or less, blindly follow and do as requested, as was the case in the foreign debts moratorium and Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, then why go through the expense, delay, and foolishness of meeting and thinking we constitute a decent, deliberate, legislative body?

Again I ask if all this is to be true, why have Congress? Why have leaders? Why not let a Secretary of the Treasury, selected by Wall Street and the Wall Street money interest, run the country and manage its finance just as is now done and sought to be done, except without the wear and tear of a Congress, some Members of which may be a bit rebellious and just a little unwilling to be lead at all times in all matters?

Mr. Chairman, I am not only opposed to the sales tax I am also opposed to and shall vote against either an increase of postage on first-class mail or a tax on gasoline or an additional tax on manufactured tobacco products. I shall likewise oppose all other nuisance taxes, such as taxes on soft or cool drinks, candies, and so on.

I am convinced that sufficient revenue for current ex-than these just mentioned. Let us trim out all unnecessary bureaus and commissions and we can curtail our expenditures so there will not be any need for all these taxes. I have just referred to the red tape and unnecessary and vicious usurpation of power in the Department of Agriculture. The same kind of situation, I am sure, exists in all the other departments.

I feel that it is not at all necessary to squeeze the last few pennies out of the common people to refinance the foreign loans and offset our loss there, to buy up the bad loans of the international bankers, and to pile up additional hundreds of millions of dollars in the vaults of the immensely rich.

To my mind we can not tax our people out of the depression. It would be much better for us to sell Government bonds and bring money out of hoarding and put it in circulation rather than as a taxgatherer attempt to squeeze additional millions out of the people, to be delivered to those who are hoarding millions and billions of dollars.

The sale of bonds would bring money out of hoarding and put it into circulation. The sales tax and other taxes of the poor gets the last dime, nickel, or penny from our povertystricken people and puts it into the hands of the only real hoarders who have never known or felt hunger or want, and who view with an indifferent, heartless, and cruel stare the millions of upturned, freezing, and starving faces of the innocent victims of the relentless greed of great wealth.

Mr. Chairman, why are these taxes being sought? The answer is to balance the Budget. Who got the Budget out of balance? Who caused the deficit? The answer is, the very crowd who are now asking for it to be balanced. The very men in and out of Congress who worked for and voted for the foreign debts moratorium and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act are now loudest in this advocacy of taxes to pay the losses caused by these two bills. Why is it sought to tax the poorest of the poor? Listen. The answer is to raise revenue to help foreign nations balance their budget; to buy up without indorsement notes which the international banks are afraid to carry and to make loans of the people's money as large as $100,000,000 at a clip to single big corporations, to carry on an orgy of bureaucratic expensive control of all the people's affairs striking at the very foundations of our Government, and to make millions of useless expenditures of money too numerous to mention, such as building here in Washington numerous, expensive, and unnecessary buildings and tearing down and destroying most beautiful, splendid, and useful buildings only because some bureaucratic appointee likes better the coffin-shaped building that is to be built in the place of the splendid, beautiful Post Office Department Building, or because some bureaucratic appointee thinks the tower is too high, or does not like for the clock in the tower to tell him the time of night he passes by, or because these buildings are not in accord with some one's distorted asthetic taste they are now doomed to destruction at enormous cost to make way for a building not any better and not as pretty at a fabulous cost to the taxpayers. The sales-tax sponsors want the poorest of the poor taxed to pay these bills. I object. It is not right.

Is this Congress to put over this program of iron and blood, do absolutely nothing for the farmer, the laborer, or the private independent citizen or business man, and then adjourn for its Members to rush to the conventions to construct political platforms of delicious promises made only to deceive and never to be kept? We have had the legislative program of iron and blood up to the present; the people of the Nation are asking "what is to follow?"

Instead of invading every home and taxing every man, woman, and child, Congress should relieve the already too heavy tax burden and by constitutional amendment provide for an exemption from all taxes of a reasonable amount of real and personal property for home purposes.

Instead of more taxes and embarrassment for the farmers, a real relief program should be provided. Instead of remaining an outraged borrower, the farmers should receive penses of the Government can be raised from taxes other governmental aid elevating and stabilizing his prices and making him an independent citizen with money for his own use and to spare.

Instead of squeezing more money out of the poor for the big corporations and multimillionaires, legislation should be enacted putting the hoarded money of the wealthy to work giving employment at reasonable salaries.

The rights of the individual private citizen and small business concern should be preserved instead of the masses of people being left as the prey of the monopolies of our Nation.

The farm problem should be solved; the railroad or transportation question should be handled at once to the best interest of all the people; a system of banking should be set up at the earliest possible moment making absolutely secure against loss the deposits of our people; the great monopolies again should be held in due bounds; the rights of all our citizens protected to the fullest, and the confidence of our people in their Government and in each other restored to that high standard of faith and patriotism possessed by our fathers.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture in some respects are not only unjust, but it seems to me they are absolutely foolish. Before these regulations were put out the question was raised as to whether they were to be permanent. I took this matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture because it vitally affects the people of my State as it does the people of your State. I asked them to change some of those regulations, especially the one referring to cotton and rice. The regulations prescribed by the Secretary in that respect were never contemplated by this Congress. Nobody ever thought that such a foolish regulation as that would be made by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Many farmers do not need this aid, but about one-tenth of them do. Here is a man who, because he is a poor man, must borrow money in order to make his cotton crop. He is penalized by the Secretary of Agriculture because he is poor and because he wants to borrow money and is forced to reduce his acreage. Here is a man, his neighbor, who can raise the crop he raised last year in full, or he can double it ten times, but here is a poor man who has to borrow money and he must cut his crop down. The Secretary of Agriculture has fixed a rule that penalizes him because he is poor, and he says, "You can not grow as much as you did last year." I think that is absolutely ridiculous.

They have not only prescribed foolish regulations with reference to cotton, but they have done so with reference to other things. For instance, in the great rice district of Arkansas, which is about the third largest in the United States, they have fixed a regulation providing that the loan is small and becomes a first lien on the crop, and in that level country, the prairie, they have to pump all the water that goes on their rice-growing farms, which costs them about $15 an acre. Now they have fixed the regulations of borrowing so low on them that they could not afford to take a loan because it would not make a crop, and if he did take it, prevents him from borrowing elsewhere as he has given a first lien on his crop.

We have appealed time after time for them to raise that to where it would be enough for them to make their crop. They have raised it somewhat after this appeal, but not to where it ought to be. I hope if we ever make a loan of this kind again we will put some restrictions in the bill that will control even the Secretary of Agriculture so that he can not make such drastic regulations with respect to the poor farmer who is sweating away his life in order to make a living.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The act of Congress approved January 31, 1931, entitled "An act for the relief of the Uncompanger reclamation project, Colorado" (Private, No. 300, 71st Cong.), is hereby amended to extend for one year from and after January 1, 1932, the time for beginning construction of drainage system upon the Uncompanger project, and any and all construction charges accruing upon or for said project for or during the year 1932, shall be deferred and included in and made payable as a part of the project supplemental construction charge provided for in said act of January 31, 1931; and in order to afford opportunity to complete the construction authorized by the act of Congress approved February 21, 1931 (Public, No. 708), relating to the Grand Valley reclamation project, Colorado, any and all construction charges accruing upon or for said project for or during the year 1932 shall be deferred without interest and penalties and shall be included in and made payable as project supplemental construction charges.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Page 3, line 22, strike out the clause "without interest and penalties," and the further amendment, at the end of the section insert the following: "under the terms as provided in this act."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Stafforn: Page 3, line 22, after the word "deferred," strike out the words "without interest and penalties," and at the end of the section, after the word "charges," insert "under the terms as provided in this act."

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. At the expiration of the period for which deferment of charges is made under this act, all districts, water-users' associations, or other water-users' organizations, and all individuals accepting the provisions hereof shall resume payment of charges on the basis of and in accordance with existing contracts and shall continue payments thereafter until the entire indebtedness of said districts, water-users' associations, or other water-users' organizations, and individuals to the United States shall have been fully paid. In the case of a district, water-users' association or other water-users' organization, or individual having contracts executed pursuant to the act of February 21, 1911 (36 Stat. 925), the act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat. 686), or the act of May 25, 1926 (444 Stat. 636), or any special act the deferred construction installment or installments for the calendar year 1931, and that portion of the 1932 installment or installments of deferred construction and/or operation and maintenance for 1931 and 50 per cent of the installment and/or installments of such deferred charges for 1932, shall be paid as an additional installment to be due and payable one year after the date the last installment under existing contracts shall become due, except in those cases in which the Secretary of the Interior, whose decision shall be final, shall find necessary additional installments, which he is hereby authorized to fix. In the case of any district, water-users' association, or other water-users' organization, or individual under contract for payment of construction charge pursuant to subsection F, section 4, act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 702), construction payments shall be continued on the basis of existing contracts until the entire indebtedness to the United States, including all charges deferred pursuant to this act, shall have been fully paid. Installments so carried over shall be subjected to the reductions provided for in section 7 hereof.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, page 5, line 10, strike out the figure "7" and insert the figure "8."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Smith of Idaho: Page 5, line 10, strike out the figure "7" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "8."

The amendment was agreed to.
The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 6. The Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, is further authorized to defer the payment to the United States from any water-users' organization, as defined in section 1 hereof, and from any individual water-right applicant or entryman of construction charges and installments of deferred construction and/or deferred operation and maintenance charges for the calendar year 1930 and prior thereto. Such deferred charges, together with penalty or interest to December 31, 1931, under existing laws and contracts shall be paid in such annual installments as the Secretary of the Interior may fix.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, at the end of line 3, page 6, insert a comma and the following after the word "contracts": "and thereafter at a rate of interest to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 6, line 3, after the word "contracts," insert a comma and the following language: "and thereafter at a rate of interest to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I wish to say that this section has reference to existing law and existing contracts, the rate it would not be harmful, would not add anything whatever

Mr. STAFFORD. The language in the bill is "such deferred charges, together with penalty or interest to December 31, 1931, under existing laws and contracts."

The bill as brought over from the Senate is predicated upon the idea that no interest shall be charged. This provision says penalty and interest shall be charged to December 31, 1931, and I am carrying out the idea that thereafter it shall be charged at such rate of interest as is carried in section 1.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman will permit, section 1 refers to the deferred payments of 1931 and one-half of 1932. Section 6 refers to payments due and not paid for 1930 and prior years. The existing law provides for interest and penalty on those deferred payments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me ask the gentleman, because he has far better acquaintance with the operation of the law than I have, as to these deferred charges for the calendar year 1930. If they are not paid on December 31, 1931, as prescribed by the contract, what interest do they then bear?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They bear 6 per cent interest, and there is also a penalty attached, and, in addition, the water can not be furnished under the law to those who are delinquent on payments due December 31, 1931.

Mr. STAFFORD. So, if they are not paid on December 31, 1931, they will continue to bear interest under the terms of the contract?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Absolutely. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment just proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Collections of construction charges for the calendar year 1931 (which charges are subject to adjustment and are adjusted under sections 1, 2, and 4 of this act) and penalties and interest, if any, from water-users' organizations and individual water-right applications or landowners, heretofore made under existing contracts, plus interests on all amounts so collected at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, shall be credited upon the succeeding payments as they become due, including operation and maintenance

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Strike out the figures "1935" and insert in lieu thereof "1934."

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Keller reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill, S. 3706, for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects constructed and operated under the reclamation law and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

COLORADO'S TWO RECLAMATION PROJECTS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement made by myself on February 23, 1932, before the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives, on the bill, H. R. 9489, for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF COLORADO

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, what your committee wants to know is, first, the fairness, just-ness, and reasonableness of this bill. H. R. 9489, and second and very definitely, as to the actual necessity for its enactment at this

I will speak first as the Representative in Congress from the western half of Colorado, which includes the Uncompangre Valley reclamation project and the Grand Valley reclamation project, both of which are in my congressional district. I live in an adjoining county to the three counties in which those two projects are situated and have known those people and their conditions inti-mately and have represented them in this House for the past 23 matery and have represented them in this House for the past 23 years.

I hesitate somewhat to picture for a public record the actual conditions of the water users on those two projects as seriously as they really are at this time. Those water users have kept going during the past few years by absolutely forcing in every way possible payments from the people on the projects and practically compelling them to make payments of money, much of which had to be borrowed in every way possible and little of which has been repaid or can be repaid at this time.

On the Grand Valley project some seventy-odd water users have been compelled to deed their farms to the Water Users' Association in order to get water during the past year. They have not been able to sell their crops, and they can not make the payments necessary to secure a reconveyance to themselves of their titles to their homes. I am advised by the bankers and many substantial people living upon and adjacent to that project that the water users have completely exhausted their credit. They have no collateral that is not already mortgaged for probably more than it could be sold for. Several banks upon those two projects have suspended or have been closed, and the remaining banks say they can not make any further loans to these water users under the avisting conditions. not make any further loans to these water users under the existing conditions.

can not make any further loans to these water users under the existing conditions.

The Uncompahgre people have not deeded their lands to their association, but they are in equally, if not more, serious condition; that is, the water users on both projects are facing utter ruin unless they can be relieved for the present from their indebtednesses to the Government and be given an opportunity to raise another crop this year. Even their working stock and farming implements and practically all of their personal property are mortgaged; and if those mortgages are foreclosed, they will be put out of their homes and set out in the world with nothing. Notwithstanding the severe drought a fairly good crop was produced last season, but, due to market conditions, the settlers have been compelled to sell their crops for much less than the actual cost of production; besides, they can not find a market even at any price for much of their crop sufficient to pay the freight and leave them any balance at all. The banks can not possibly even furnish working capital to the water users to purchase the necessary seed and feed during this year.

Gentlemen, it is absolutely imperative that Congress should extend such deferment of the payments upon the construction charges as to make it possible for the people under these projects to live and raise their crops this year but even if they do raise a good crop this year and if they do succeed in getting a fair price for it, every dollar of the proceeds will be consumed in paying existing obligations and paying for the operation and maintenance and upkeep of lateral ditches, flumes, and so forth, and it will be utterly impossible for them to pay construction charges in addition to all that and live during the coming year. They absolutely must be allowed to have some surplus to clothe and feed themselves and families not only during 1932 but to purchase seed and carry on during 1933.

The least possible relief that would afford a faint hope to the carry on during 1933.

The least possible relief that would afford a faint hope to the water users on these two projects in my district would be to grant them the relief provided in this bill. While there ought to be a straight moratorium for the years 1931, 1932, and 1933, to let them get on their feet again, yet we are not considering 1933 in this bill.

The relief that we are now asking, although not being all I think they should have, will be a great encouragement and will give the sorely distressed water users some hope of a possibility of paying out.

There is a human equation involved in this situation, and I speak now of all of the water users on all of the Government projects throughout the Western States. The settlers upon those projects must be given a fair chance for their very existence and a fair opportunity to supply their families with at least the bare necessities of life. Anything short of that destroys their courage and morale. Not only the banks but the business men and merchants of those communities have extended all the credit the possibly can and as long as they can and they are now compelled and morale. Not only the banks but the business men and merchants of those communities have extended all the credit they possibly can and as long as they can, and they are now compelled under existing financial conditions in our country to absolutely refuse further credit. Those settlers have tried heroically and with the utmost energy and frightfully hard work and good faith, for years and years, to cooperate with the Reclamation Bureau in every way possible. Those people are not repudiators, nor are they disposed to complain of their lot or be trouble makers. But the plain fact is that they have reached the limit of their endurance. They are now at a point where they simply can not comply with the Government requirements and continue to live.

It does seem to me that Uncle Sam and Congress both should and must recognize that there is a personal side and a human element in this situation. Those projects can not continue without farmers, and farmers can not carry on with the crop prices they are now having and with the many handicaps and discouragements that they are working under unless they can obtain more liberal consideration from the Reclamation Bureau than has been accorded them in recent years. This situation is not the fault of the Reclamation Bureau nor of the law, but it is a cruel and tragic result that is brought about by this universal depression. Practically everything the farmer raises is at the lowest price it has been in 40 years. Moreover, the freight rates from all that interior mountainous portion of the West are so excessively high that they largely consume the value of the crops before they reach the market. It does seem as though the officials here in Washington do not and can not visualize or realize the conditions of those sorely tried and cruelly afflicted people under present conditions. the conditions of those sorely tried and cruelly afflicted people under present conditions.

If there was any reasonable hope for improved conditions within the next 12 months, that might make it possible to collect some small part of the 1932 construction charges from some of the settlers on some of the projects.

small part of the 1932 construction charges from some of the settlers on some of the projects.

But, as I say, they have got to pay operation and maintenance charges at all events, which amount to several dollars an acre, and they must pay some grocery bills and other expenses. Conditions have been getting worse all the time for three years; and, moreover, there appears to be little hope at this time of there being sufficiently favorable conditions or circumstances that will enable these people to work out, even under the provisions of this bill.

You must bear in mind that these reclamation projects are enormously expensive constructions, and the upkeep of the reservoirs and large canals and distributing ditches and flumes involves an immense amount of annual hard work and expense. Raising crops by irrigation is a very expensive way of farming.

These reclamation projects are organized in what is known as reclamation projects, and the Government deals with them in that collective and incorporated capacity. The Government holds a first lien against all of the land and irrigation reservoirs, canals, and property of that kind. So that every man's home has a blanket Government mortgage on it of anywhere from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 on an average. The associations stand good to Uncle Sam for all of the indebtedness of all its members.

Now when they have not, practically speaking, a dollar, the reservoirs is whether or not the Government is going to drive them.

Now when they have not, practically speaking, a dollar, the question is whether or not the Government is going to drive them off the project and out of their homes and starve them out, or let them stay there and try to work out and pay the Government as soon as they can make it out of the land and out of their crops. as soon as they can make it out of the land and out of their crops. They have no other way of paying. Suppose the Reclamation Bureau drives practically all of them off their lands, what has Uncle Sam left? He has a lot of farms that have been compelled to run down for lack of means to upkeep them. These farms will then have to be turned over to new settlers to rebuild and to try to carry on from where the present old-timers have left off. That would be a calamity, almost an inhuman act, which I know Congress can not and will not permit. These old-time settlers, who have put in 20 or more of the best years of their lives in reclaiming this barren land, should be permitted to stay in their homes and pay back the Government when they can. Those settlers have already repaid to the Government something like $50,000,000, and some of them have paid back nearly a hundred per cent of all that is due.

Now, all we western Members, who represent these projects, are Now, all we western Members, who represent these projects, are asking of you gentlemen of this committee and of Congress is to withhold collection of construction charges, which these people withhold collection of construction charges, which these people can not now pay.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I must, in justice to the people of three naturally wonderfully rich counties in my State, say that when our Government has been so prodigal with its relief to suffering humanity all over the world and is now appropriating billions of dollars for relief, which largely goes to railroads and big banks and large business concerns, I do feel that it is unfortunate when our high officials are either unwilling or very rejuctant to grant to our own pioneer, loyal, patriotic, hardworking, worthy, and courageous citizens the bare relief so absolutely necessary to permit them to live and to continue to develop their homes and these projects and to largely enhance the value of the Government's investment in time. If these settlers are forcibly driven off, bankrupt, heartbroken, discouraged, and necessarily embittered, who will take their places? Who can possibly carry on as well? Who are the most deserving, those who have spent almost a lifetime of hard work trying to reclaim the have spent almost a lifetime of hard work trying to reclaim the desert and make a home or those who may come in and take up these farms and homes that Uncle Sam has compelled these pioneer settlers to leave behind them?

Gentlemen, I appeal to you in the name of common and deserving humanity, in the name of the hardy, courageous, western spirit that has made these projects possible, to extend, not grudgingly but fairly, such relief to them as will not only make it possible for them to live and keep their homes but to give them some hope and encouragement and a feeling of gratitude and appreciation of our Government.

Mr. Cox. Mr. Taylor, this is, after all, a loan that they are asking.

Mr. Cox. Mr. Taylor, this is, after all, a loan that they are asking,

Mr. Taylor. No; it is not a loan. We are not asking for a dollar. We are appealing to Congress to let those settlers have water this year to raise a crop on their farms so they may continue to live on them and pay the Government back out of their crops, the only way they can pay.

fr. Cox. All right. Then what is the objection to promising at least interest on this deferred payment?

Mr. Taylor. Those settlers, most of them, absolutely could not they paid interest even if they were compelled to promise to. Even if they paid interest it would go into the reclamation fund and not into the Federal Treasury. Goodness alive, gentlemen, when the administration and Congress are granting moratoriums and prodigally throwing money all over the world, to every nation that will take it, with no intention of ever paying it back, and here who have gally throwing money all over the world, to every nation that will take it, with no intention of ever paying it back, and here at home we have a lot of deserving pioneer people out there who have endured untold hardships to settle and reclaim that country from a wilderness, and need a little time to work out of this depression, I do not see how there can be any question about the justness or urgency of their appeal. Mr. Michener is wrong about their crop being guaranteed. It is only about 2 or 3, possibly 4, years out of 5 that we get a good crop. We have late and early frosts, and droughts, and many other obstacles. The altitude of my district ranges from about 4,500 to 10,000 feet, and our fruit and potato and some other crops are often destroyed by frosts.

Mr. Michener. That is your particular district?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes; but practically all of those projects are in a mountainous country. Our greatest handicap against us is our long distance from markets, insufficient marketing facilities, and frightfully high freight rates for everything we buy or sell. Speaking of Idaho potatoes being sold in the eastern markets, I sometimes think they advertise them somewhat the way they do the Rocky Ford cantaloupes in all the eastern markets. Nearly all over the United States farmers and truck growers buy from Colorado Rocky Ford cantaloupe growers' seed and plant that seed and grow a crop and advertise those cantaloupes as Rocky Ford cantaloupes. That is the only way the people in the East, North, and South ever get Rocky Ford cantaloupes. They scarcely ever get one that is grown in Colorado. People get them here in the East throughout May, June, July, and August, and they do not get ripe in our Rocky Ford country until September. Cantaloupes grown in the East, North, or South, even from our seed, do not taste much like the cantaloupes grown at Rocky Ford or at Palisade, by irrigation and Colorado sunshine. Gentlemen, with all the earnestness and seriousness I can command, I tell you this is a "ground-hog case." We hav

I might say for my own district that for the last two years they have not been able to pay the operation and maintenance charges and the construction charges and besides do the drainage work and the construction charges and besides do the drainage work that is necessary. When irrigated land is not properly drained, it becomes water-logged. We call it going to seep. The Uncompahgre project has got to be drained. A large part of it is now so water-soaked that it will not grow anything. It will cost half a million dollars to build the necessary drain ditches and canals and tiling, and so forth, to wash out that alkali ground and reclaim it and bring it back to production; and the Government at present declines to do that work. I passed a bill last winter giving the water users on this project the right to use all the money that they would otherwise be required to pay to Uncle Sam toward the repayment of the construction cost for five years, and allowing them to spend that money on the drainage of that land. So that the Treasury is not going to get a dollar of that construction charge for five years. But we have not now got the money to do that drainage work.

for five years. But we have not now got the money to do that drainage work.

It is an enormous proposition to figure out a system of drainage for some 8,000 or 10,000 acres of that water-soaked land, and it is awfully expensive. They have been industriously investigating, surveying, and experimenting, and trying to get ready to do this drainage work. At my request they sent some engineers and practical irrigators up to Mr. Smith's district in Idaho to examine their electric pumping wells that they have there. They have quite a number of shallow wells with electric pumps, and they set them running day and night, pumping the water out of the ground so as to keep the water level in the ground down far enough so that it will not destroy the crops.

It has two very important purposes—it prevents the ground

It has two very important purposes—it prevents the ground from going to seep and furnishes a large amount of additional water for irrigation. Those water users have also investigated other systems of drainage. That bill to which I refer, for the relief of the Uncompangre Valley water users act of January 31, 1931

(46 Stats. 1974), is printed in full in the report on this bill. It relieved the water users on that project from paying the construction charges last year and put those charges off to the end of the payment period. But they were expected to start on the drainage work this year. Now they have not got, and absolutely can not get, the money to do so. There is no possibility of their doing about $85,000 worth of drainage work that they are required to do this year. The Government is not reving out any money nor give The Government is not paying out any money nor giving up anything. That law requires these water users to either spend the money on drainage, or pay it into the reclamation fund. Now, what I am asking is that you do not require us to pay it into the reclamation fund; because we want to spend it on that drainage, as that law of mine allows them to do. We have absolutely got to do that drainage as soon as we can, but we have not the preliminary plans and are not ready to start yet. All I am asking in this bill for that project is a year's extension of the time for starting that drainage work.

It is not really a matter of money at all. It is a matter of giving these people an opportunity to do a lot of hard and expensive work. That is the object of section 3 of this bill, H. R. 9489. I wrote that section for that purpose and personally presented it to both the Senate and House Irrigation Committees as an amendment to the original Senate and House bills, and both those committees accepted that amendment without changing a single word, and both reported out the bill as it is now before you. The Senate passed the bill in this identical form within about three minutes. The Senate knew that their Irrigation Committee had very fully and carefully considered the bill, and they evidently thought no discussion was necessary. Speaking for the Uncompangre project, I am not asking for a loan of any money nor for a waiver or cancellation of any payments of any money or for any extension of time to nay any money but for an money or for an extension of time to pay any money but for an extension of time and an opportunity to do the very technical and expensive work of drainage that is specifically authorized by that act of Congress passed a year ago.

To a certain extent, the same applies to my Grand Valley project. I passed an act a year ago that is also set out in full in the report on this bill: that is, the act approved February 21, 1931 (46 Stat. 1202). That act authorizes those water users to construct a power plant on that project, from which they expect to derive a large and very necessary revenue. They have not yet had time to com-plete that construction, and section 3 of this bill gives them a year's extension on construction charges for that purpose. for the additional reason that most of them, as I stated before, have already been compelled to convey all their property to the association and they have no property nor credit nor money to pay this year's construction charges.

Mr. Bankhead. The statement you have made rather confirms my opinion that the Interstate Commerce Commission is right when they say you are out of luck.

Mr. TAYLOR. We are out of luck in many ways just now, and we western Members have a desperately hard time to convince you people down here of our situation.

Mr. Bankhead. You need not shake your golden locks at me. I have never failed you that I know of.

Mr. TAYLOR. No; you never have, and on behalf of my constituents and myself I profoundly thank you for your invariable consideration and good will. You have been out there and looked us over, and we were delighted to have you do it.

Mr. Smith. I wish to suggest, with reference to having people come out and look over these projects, that Hon. Will Wood, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, on the floor of the House of Representatives 12 years ago made a speech in May against reclamation, and in June, after traveling over the reclamation projects, he made an address at a meeting in Boise, Idaho, in which he stated he was not fully informed when he was arguing in which he stated he was not fully informed when he was arguing against reclamation, and he has supported the policy ever since. Chairman Fitzgerald, of New York, became a strong friend of reclamation after visiting the projects, as did Chairman Swagar Sherley, of Kentucky. The late Congressman Good, of Iowa, chairman of the committee, was also convinced after visiting the projects that the reclamation policy was a wise one and supported it strongly, as did Congressman Cramton, chairman of the subcommittee, and Congressman Murphy, of Ohio, ranking Republican member of the subcommittee, having in charge the activities of the Interior Department—all eastern men.

You gentlemen who are prajudiced against reclamation of the

You gentlemen who are prejudiced against reclamation of the arid lands and do not realize how it benefits all of the country are invited to come out and inspect these projects and visit with our splendid people, and you will conclude that the money spent in building up the West is in the interest of the whole country.

Mr. Michener. Don't you think, Mr. Smith, that when the Members get out there they are under a spell? I was with the gentlemen from Colorado, I think, on one of those trips, when you visited Mount Rainier, and I heard Senator Robinson and Mr. Wood say that night that Mount Tacoma was Mount Tacoma, and that it should be changed from Mount Rainier. They never appreciated it until they got there. They were in the environment. Next year they came down from the West with thousands of petitions and delegations to change the name; but when Senator Robinson and Mr. Wood got back here, away from the environment, and got back on to normal again they appreciated that possibly they had spoken out of order, and they assumed a reasonable, natural position.

Mr. Smrrh. But that did not prove true with these gentlemen; because all of them, after they came out there, have supported the reclamation policy on the floor of the House, and none of them has been a stronger friend of that policy than Mr. Cramton, of Michigan.

Mr. Taylor. I may add in regard to this Uncompange project, that they have also got to rebuild or enlarge a 6-mile tunnel some time, and that will cost them probably $500,000. Thus far, the Government will not agree to do that work. The association may have to bond itself somehow or other to do so. We appeal to you gentlemen to give these settlers a chance to work out. When the bill was first introduced it provided for a flat moratorium for three years, and it went before the Irrigation Committees of both the Senate and the House in that form.

Senate and the House in that form.

They held meetings and decided to cut that in two in the middle and give them a moratorium for last year—which is water that has all gone over the wheel—and only give them a 50 per cent moratorium for this year, and give them nothing for 1933. So it is just half of what they were trying to get and justly needed. The water users feel that they ought to have a 3-year chance to work out, because they are so desperately in debt; but nevertheless, the committees decided to cut out 1933 and practically said, "We will cross that bridge when we get to it."

Mr. Purnell. Are you willing to say affirmatively that they shall not have anything for next year?

Mr. Taylor. No; I can not speak for next year. But if prices are as low and times as hard then as they are now, God help them. We will have to cross that bridge when we reach it. We all hope and pray that conditions will be so much better that they will not need any further relief at that time.

need any further relief at that time.

But I started to say that the few potatoes that Idaho sends back here are not an infinitesimal drop in the bucket compared with the produce of 34,000,000 farmers throughout the United States. It is somewhat like the Imperial Valley products from California. The most important part of the crops they produce in that country comes in January, February, March, and April, when the snow is on the ground in the rest of the country. Their competition does not amount to anything.

Mr. Michener. Except that the only question is whether you take it off the vine or out of the can, so far as the consumer is concerned.

Mr. TAYLOR. Gentlemen, we could have had every one of the western Members come before you here. There are 19 of us Members of the House who represent all the reclamation projects. The chairman, Mr. Hall, and the ranking Republican and former chairman of this committee, Mr. SMITH, and I, came at their invitation. man of this committee, Mr. SMITH, and I, came at their invitation. Possibly that was a courtesy to me, because I was a member of the Irrigation Committee for about 12 years, and was a part of the time chairman of the committee, and have always, ever since I came to Congress many years ago, taken an active part in these irrigation matters. I might add that I went out and personally examined many of these projects this last summer. Mr. Murphy, Mr. French, Mr. Hastings, and I, as the Interior Department Appropriation Subcommittee, visited and personally inspected and critically inquired into about 15 or 20 of these reclamation projects. We put in several months investigating reclamation projects. We put in several months investigating reclamation projects, ects. We put in several months investigating reclamation projects, national parks, Indian conditions, and so forth, this last summer. We learned their conditions, and we know them personally. We could have all those gentlemen come in here and bespeak the urgent need for this relief.

You are principally asked to grant temporary forgiveness for something that has gone by and could not be avoided. We are only asking a 50 per cent reduction this year on the construction cost—not on the operation and maintenance. Uncle Sam does not pay a cent of that. The water users have got to do that themselves, no matter what it costs nor how much work they have to do on all the canals, the ditches, the flumes and tunnels, the reservoirs, and on all the lateral ditches and headgates. Raising crops by irrigation is really a hard and very expensive proposition. And when we raise a crop we are a long, long way from the ing crops by frigation is really a hard and very expensive proposi-tion. And when we raise a crop we are a long, long way from the market. If we ship to Chicago, we are 1,500 miles or more away; if we ship to the Pacific coast, we are also 1,500 miles; if we ship to the Gulf, we are that far; and there is nothing between us and the North Pole in the other direction.

the North Pole in the other direction.

Mr. Michener. You would not advise, under those conditions, further development of reclamation projects?

Mr. Taylor. No, I would not; until conditions change very much indeed. There are many sites in Colorado, most of them in my district, that may some time be made into practical irrigation projects; but I have for 20 years absolutely refused to create any more projects in my district because I knew from long and serious experience what back-breaking hard work and heart-breaking disappointments some of them are.

I may add, parenthetically, that they are no soft snap for the Congressmen who represent them. We are, nearly every session of Congress, between the devil of the Reclamation Bureau here in Washington and the deep blue sea of political oblivion out home. It may seem rather peculiar, but it is true that the 30 western Sentors always pass these reclamation relief bills without ever batting tors always pass these reclamation relief bills without ever batting an eye or anybody questioning the justness of these measures, while we 19 Members of the House who represent those districts are jumped onto from the East, North, and South for asking so much, and we are often criticized and denounced at home because we don't get more.

I certainly hope there will be no more new reclamation projects started for many years to come, and certainly not until after the Boulder Canyon project is completed. But I understand the President, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Director of the Reclamation Service are going to, during this session of Congress, recommend a new project that will cost $18,500,000.

Mr. Purnell. Is that the Columbia River?

Mr. Taylor. No. The Columbia River project would cost $500,-000,000, and the reclamation of the central part of California would also cost at least $500,000,000. When times get better Congress will probably be called upon to consider both of those projects.

Mr. Martin. Where is this one?

Mr. Taylor. It probably would not be appropriate for me to specifically name it at this time, as it is not before you. But in all probability, it will come before you before long.

all probability, it will come before you before long.

Mr. Chairman, I have received a large number of very earnest and forcible resolutions and letters and telegrams in support of this bill from the three counties in which these two Colorado reclamation projects are situated, and I will not ask to insert all of them in the record. But there is one resolution from the bank in Delta County that states the situation so concisely and clearly that I ask that it may be inserted in the hearings, as a typical statement of the sentiment of the business interests throughout those three counties. those three counties.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, we will take this bill under consideration.

(Thereupon the committee proceeded to the consideration of business in executive session.)

LEGISLATION

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this permission in order that I might print a letter which I have addressed to one of my friends, the contents being as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Friend: I hope you will read the inclosed speech, which covers the sales tax and the soldiers' bonus; also the statement taken from the Congressional Record relating to seniority. My! what a row the proposed sales tax caused. We who opposed the policy of taxing the necessities of life defeated the same on the

I want you to read what this man Hearst said about the income tax, which is the fairest method known to raise taxes. His papers foully attacked me when I started a fight on a $600,000,000 author-tax, which is the fairest method known to raise taxes. His papers foully attacked me when I started a fight on a $600,000,000 authorization to build a lot of warships. This was in violation of the spirit of the treaty this Nation had entered into. Such criticism was for the purpose of injuring me at home. However, those connected with big business will never deter me from performing that which I think is right. This is the second time I have been attacked; the authorizations that I opposed amounting to over $4,000,000,000 failed. If big business had received these benefits, our Government might now be paralyzed as the Nation is confronted with a deficit of over $2,000,000,000.

May I point with pride to some of the honors that have come to me as your Congressman? I have served on seven committees and am now next to the chairman on an exclusive major committee; also chairman of the patronage committee, which looks after 171 Members; chairman of subcommittee on aeronautics, also yards and docks; chairman speakers' committee of the congressional committee; chairman Oklahoma House delegation; and secretary of the caucus. Hard work and the rule of seniority have made this possible, yet my friends are entitled to the credit, as nothing could have been accomplished without their continued support. Did you know that States that have observed the rule of seniority now control practically everything in Congress, as their citizens know every time a change is made in their Representative, all assignments are lost. This district would lose all I have gained during my 18 years of hard work if a change is made in its Representative. My party has not been in power since the war. Money has gone ments are lost. This district would lose all I have gained during my 18 years of hard work if a change is made in its Representative. My party has not been in power since the war. Money has gone into hiding and it is going to be necessary to restore confidence before conditions can get better. One of the most beneficial laws that could be passed would be a national guaranty bank law. This would cause our banks instead of the Postal Savings to be patronized, thereby causing money to remain at home instead of being sent to eastern centers. I have introduced such a bill and hearings are now being held. I am doing all in my power to get this and the soldiers' bonus bill enacted into law at the earliest date possible. date possible.

I need your cooperation in all matters and certainly will thank you for any assistance you can give me. I am,
Faithfully yours,

J. V. McCLINTIC Member of Congress.

DESTRUCTIVE STORM IN ALABAMA

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in the last few hours a dreadful storm has swept over Alabama and other Southern States. A few moments ago I received a telegram from my native county, which was not mentioned in the original press reports, which telegram states that extensive damage and destruction occurred there.

It is not yet known how many people have been killed or how many people have been injured. According to the last reports I have received, there are more than 100 who are known to be dead and perhaps the number of injured will mount into the thousands. The condition is widespread over the State. Coming at this time, when it is known that desolation and distress are in existence throughout the entire country, it makes the situation far more appalling. It is my information that the Red Cross has already established headquarters in Birmingham and is busy on its mission of universal relief.

At the present time, as I stated, it is impossible to measure or even to estimate the loss of life, the number of injured, or the loss of property. The State of Alabama is shocked by the catastrophe and grieved by this sudden and awful calamity. At this time I do not desire to do anything more than simply invite the attention of the Senate to the tragedy. I have sent messages to Alabama officials, to the Red Cross, and to other citizens in an effort to ascertain if any immediate help other than that which is being supplied is absolutely imperative. If it is, I have not the slightest doubt that the Congress, in line with the humanitarian custom which has grown up through the years, will be ready to act generously and expeditiously.

If additional help should be needed, I shall present an appropriate resolution and I have no doubt as to the action this body will take. At the present time I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to this widespread tragedy which has brought so much grief and sorrow to the hearts of the people of my State and, I feel, of the people throughout the entire Nation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to express the hope that the catastrophe is not so bad as now indicated, but I am sure the Congress will take whatever action may be necessary under the circumstances.

AID OF DISTRESSED CITIZENS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed].

Some time ago, more than two months ago, I introduced a joint resolution providing that the War Department should be ready legally to act in an emergency like this. When the joint resolution was introduced I called attention to a situation then existing in my State. I was promised at that time that the measure would have immediate consideration and, of course, I naturally thought immediate attention and report. The joint resolution in time was referred to a special committee. The special committee acted and reported back to the main Committee on Military Affairs. The full Committee on Military Affairs reported the joint resolution favorably; it came before this body for consideration within a day or two; but for some reason it was ordered recommitted to the committee, and it is now slumbering there, I presume, peacefully. I have done as much as I can to get the joint resolution out of the committee without calling upon the Senate; and at this time, in order that the Senate may pass upon the matter, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee the status of this particular piece of proposed legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for the purpose indicated?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. REED. The joint resolution to which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas] refers was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs because we received a report from the War Department making it plain to us that the passage of the measure was entirely unnecessary. The War Department in that report, a copy of which I furnished the Senator from Oklahoma, called our attention to the fact that the department is now and has for years past been affording every relief in its power by supplying tentage, blankets, cots, and food in cases where calamities bring suffering and need, and that at the time the Senator from Oklahoma introduced his joint resolution the War Department was actually engaged in rendering such relief in Oklahoma to people in distress there. In Alabama to-day such relief is being extended, if it is needed, and doubtless there are places in which it is needed. The committee, therefore, decided to take no action on the joint resolution because the committee felt that its passage would be entirely unnecessary.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if I may say just another word—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Here is the exact status of this matter: When a calamity happens in the country and an appeal is made to the War Department, if the War Department desires to act it does so; but if it does not desire to act, it sets up the claim that the law prohibits its action. I have word from the Secretary of War in writing that he has to violate the law every time he acts favorably in response to such appeals. I can produce the letter. I do not care to make it public, but if any Senator desires to see it I will produce the letter. In it the Secretary of War states that every time he grants relief in response to an appeal of this kind he is forced to disobey the law, to waive it, and set it aside.

I am not trying to have the Secretary of War do anything contrary to public policy or to extend any relief which is not merited and deserved, but I do want to take away from him the opportunity of making the objection, when he does not see fit to act, that there is a law in the way. I should like to see this joint resolution become a law, Mr. President; and if I can have no assurance that a report will be made upon the measure and that it will be brought before this body, I will enter a motion that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of this particular piece of legislation, and at the proper time I shall call that motion forth.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not see any reason why the committee should reverse its decision; but, of course, the Senator may move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the joint resolution if he wishes to do so.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I wish to enter a motion, Mr. President, to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish equipment, goods, and supplies to governors and acting governors for use in aid of distressed citizens.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Oklahoma will be entered.

EXPENDITURES OF CHILDREN'S BUREAU

bering there, I presume, peacefully. I have done as much as I can to get the joint resolution out of the committee ington will yield further, I desire to say that on yesterday

I made reference to a statement of the expenses of the Children's Bureau, but I neglected to call attention to the fact that the figures I then gave did not contain the allotment made to that bureau for printing. That item has been furnished me by the department, and amounts to $70,000, so that the actual cost of the Children's Bureau during the past year has been $465,000.

In this connection, Mr. President, let me say further that I have received a letter from the Secretary of Labor explaining the activities of the Children's Bureau and the necessity for the appropriation for it, which in all fairness I ask to have printed in the RECORD. Personally, as is well known, I think that the bureau has gone far beyond the scope intended when it was established, at which time it was said that not more than $50,000 would ever be needed for its purposes, whereas at the present time it is spending nearly $500,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, March 17, 1932.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
My Dear Senator: Confirming our conversation of this morning egarding the proposed reduction of $100,000 in the appropriation for the Children's Bureau, recommended by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in H. R. 9349, I am pleased to give you the fol-on Appropriations in H. R. 9349, I am pleased to give you the following information regarding the work of this bureau:

The regular work of the Children's Bureau includes research in the fields of maternal and child health, child labor, recreation, dependency, and delinquency, and the preparation and distribution of popular and scientific bulletins. This research is of two kinds: One, special studies of particular subjects, usually carried on in particular localities; and, two, the assembling of current statistical information in certain fields covering the entire country or a large number of representative States and communities or a large number of representative States and communities.

Those engaged in child-health and child-welfare work throughout the country look to the Children's Bureau for reliable information as a basis for planning local and State programs.

Among the special studies now being carried on, the reports of

Among the special studies now being carried on, the reports of some of which are practically completed, are the following: A study of maternal deaths in 15 States, covering 7,537 deaths, for which histories were obtained by physicians on the staff of the Children's Bureau or of State departments of health, this study having been planned by an advisory committee of physicians and carried on with the approval of State medical societies; a study of the deaths and illness of infants under 1 month of age, being carried on in cooperation with the pediatrics department of the Yale University School of Medicine and the New Haven Hospital; studies of rickets in children, carried on in Washington, New Haven, and Porto Rico; studies of the welfare of children of working mothers; studies of minors injured in industrial accidents; studies of State and county welfare organization and of the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

The Children's Bureau maintains no permanent field offices, since its work covers the entire country and the nature of its investigations do not ordinarily require that employees remain the annual property of the entire treatment of the present of the presen any one place for an extended period. This accounts for the large proportion of the bureau's staff which has headquarters in Washington, the employees being sent wherever their services are Heavy demands are made upon the Children's Bureau by other governmental agencies, and these demands have increased because of needs growing out of the unemployment situation. The bu-reau is reporting monthly to the President's Organization for Employment Relief concerning relief to families and to transient Employment Relief concerning relief to families and to transient and homeless persons in many cities of 50,000 and over. These statistics are used by the President's committee and by local organizations as a basis for planning local relief programs. The service is an outgrowth of the social statistics being gathered in 42 metropolitan areas through the cooperation of community chests and councils. Again, at the request of the President's committee, the Children's Bureau has been conducting studies of child welfare in certain areas of extreme depression, especially coal-mining communities, and the facts thus gathered led to the school feeding activities undertaken in several States by the American Friends Service Committee.

Statistics of the trend in child labor in a number of States and communities and of cases dealt with by juvenile courts in nearly 100 communities are compiled regularly.

The bureau publishes each year a summary of State legislation relating to child welfare and is constantly called upon for information as to State laws on various subjects.

information as to State laws on various subjects.

Last summer the Attorney General requested the Children's Bureau to cooperate with the Department of Justice in working out a plan for more adequate treatment of juvenile offenders who violate Federal laws. The bureau is now assisting in developing plans which will promote assumption of responsibility for many of these cases by local and State courts and institutions.

The Children's Bureau receives each year an allotment from the Department of Labor appropriation for printing. During the present fiscal year the allotment is $70,000. Of this amount approximately $52,000 will be spent for popular bulletins and folders, $12,000 for new and revised publications, and the remainder for other reprints and miscellaneous printing, including the printing of field schedules and reports of current statistics. It will be seen that most of the printing expense of the Children's Bureau is for the popular bulletins, chiefly Prenatal Care, Infant Care, Child Care, and Child Management. This year the free distribution of these popular bulletins will amount to more than a million copies, and in addition large numbers are sold through the Government popular bulletins will amount to more than a million copies, and in addition large numbers are sold through the Government Printing Office. The number thus sold in 1930 amounted to 285,741 copies, in payment of which $15,612.17 was received. The bureau is never able to meet the demand for these bulletins and develops sales as far as possible.

It is necessary for the bureau to exercise the greatest possible economy in connection with its printing. Editions of technical bulletins are limited to not more than 3,000 copies, and these bulletins are never sent out to the mailing list without notices of bulletins are limited to not more than 3,000 copies, and these bulletins are never sent out to the mailing list without notices of their issuance first being sent to those on the mailing list. If a response is received to this notice indicating a desire to have a copy, it is furnished so far as the free supply permits. In this way the mailing list is kept up to date and publications are not wasted. All material is carefully prepared with a view to eliminating nonessential matter. Increases in printing costs due to higher rates established by the Government Printing Office have been heavy. been heavy.

The proposed reduction of $100,000 in the appropriation for the Children's Bureau would very seriously cripple its work, and I sincerely hope that the amount may be restored by the Senate.

Cordially yours,

W. N. DOAK, Secretary.

PETITION OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS CIVIC AND INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I present a petition from the Virgin Islands Civic and Industrial Association and ask that the body of the petition may be printed in the RECORD and the petition referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and the body thereof was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[The Virgin Islands Civic and Industrial Association (in cooperation with the new civil government of the Virgin Islands to help Virgin Islanders help themselves). Temporary headquarters, 239 West One hundred and thirty-sixth Street, New York, N. Y.]

Petition to the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America from natives of St. Thomas, St. Jan, and St. Croix, Virgin Islands, United States of America, resident in Continental United States

Honorable Congressmen:

Pursuant to the enactment of a law passed by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Fifty-ninth Congress assembled, full rights of citizenship were granted to certain nature of the Virgin Islands, United States of America, on February 25, 1927.

Section 2 (b) of this law reads that all natives of the Virgin Islands of the United States who on January 17, 1917, resided in the United States or Porto Rico, and who are not citizens or subjects of any foreign country, if not ineligible to citizenship, may upon petition filed within one year after the effective date of this act, and upon full and complete compliance of all other provisions of the naturalization laws, be naturalized without making declaration of intention.

It is further declared that all natives of the Virgin Islands, United States of America, residing in foreign countries on January 17, 1917, and on February 25, 1927, be considered "non quota" immigrants.

In defense of this petition, it must be clearly and definitely understood that the 5,000 (more or less) natives resident in the United States classified under section 2 (b) of this act did not take advantage of the "1 year" grant to secure citizenship papers without making declaration of intention because they were totally ignorant of the existence of this particular clause. When Congress granted citizenship on February 25, 1927, it was and is still the belief of at least 90 per cent of the natives resident in the United States that by reason of their failure to appear before a Danish court of record within one year after the transfer they were held to have renounced it and to have accepted citizenship in the United States according to Article VI of the sale treaty.

What is true of natives resident in the United States is also true of natives residing in foreign countries, and as a result Virgin In defense of this petition, it must be clearly and definitely of natives residing in foreign countries, and as a result Virgin Islanders representing several thousand migrants are now expatriates from the land of their birth. They are denied the privilege of properly cooperating with their kindred and others in the islands and are by every line of reasoning "a people without a flag or country."

The law governing citizenship of Virgin Islanders effective Feb.

The law governing citizenship of Virgin Islanders effective February 25, 1927, in its various ramifications has caused chaos and confusion in that it alienates parent from child and discourages those who are desirous of returning to the islands to participate in its rehabilitation program. This is admitted in the report of Gov. Paul M. Pearson to the President of the United States, recommending that justice be given to all Virgin Islanders by granting mending that justice be given to all Virgin Islanders by granting full rights of citizenship.

In view of these indisputable facts we hereby petition your honorable body of the Seventy-second Congress assembled, to gratify the expectation, hopes, yearnings, and aspirations of Virgin Islanders by putting into immediate and unhesitating effect a law granting full rights of citizenship to all native-born Virgin Islanders who have not retained their Danish citizenship, and who are not citizens of any foreign country, regardless of where they resided on January 17, 1917, or on February 25, 1927.

Respectfully submitted.

PROPOSED TWENTIETH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION—
ADDRESS BY SENATOR WALSH OF MONTANA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record an address delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] over the radio last night upon the subject of the twentieth amendment to the Constitution.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

On the 3d day of March, in this year of grace 1932, there was transmitted to the Secretary of State, upon the concurrence of the two Houses of Congress, for certification to the legislatures of the various States for ratification in accordance with the fifth article of the Constitution, the twentieth amendment thereto, commonly known as the lame-duck amendment. So responsive is it to popular sentiment that, having passed the Senate with but 7 dissentient votes, and the House with but 56, it was ratified by the Legislature of the staid old State of Virginia even before the resolution of the Congress in the premises had been formally and officially submitted to the body so acting, and like action was promptly taken by the Legislature of the State of New York, just about to adjourn for the session, when the proposal was laid before it. It is singular that these two States should have led in the ratification of this particular amendment, the two in which took place the most searching and decisive debates over the adoption of the Constitution itself.

The amendment is proposed for the correction of at least two major evils incident to our system of government. The election for Members of Congress takes place on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of each alternate year, but the terms of the Members elect do not begin until the following 4th day of March on the expiration of the terms of their predecessors at noon on that day, at which time the session of Congress commencing on the first Monday in December preceding automatically comes to an end. Accordingly, a full session of Congress intervenes between the time of the election and the commencement of the terms of all Members elect of the House of Representatives and of one-third of those of the Senate. The result is that Members who have actually been repudiated by their constituents continue throughout a whole session of Congress to represent them and of one-third of those of the Senate. The result is that Members who have actually been repudiated by their constituents continue throughout a whole session of Congress to represent them. It is conceivable that though a complete party turnover may have occurred in the November election and the policies of the administration were distinctly disavowed, they could be enacted into law with the approval of the President, who likewise remains in office until the following 4th of March, and who is in a position to execute the policies thus sanctioned in defiance of the will of the people expressed at the policy.

to execute the policies thus sanctioned in deflance of the will of the people expressed at the polls.

It is from the fact that one of its purposes is to prevent legislation through the votes of Members who have been defeated for reelection that the amendment gets the designation by which it is popularly known, such Members being jocularly known as lame ducks. Some wag classified Members not returning as either "lame ducks" or "rare birds," the latter being those who retire on their own volition, the former those who quit on the insistence of their constituents. As may be imagined, the "rare birds" are far outnumbered by the "lame ducks," though there passed into the first-mentioned class in recent years some Members of the Senate of conspicuous ability.

Senate of conspicuous ability.

Senator John Sharp Williams retired a few years since to revel among his books and live the quiet life on his plantation; Jim Reed was lured by the prospect of a lucrative law practice, fully realized, according to current rumor; and Harry Hawes is about to quit to devote himself to the sport that made Izaak Walton famous and to promote it for the enjoyment of the multitude.

and to promote it for the enjoyment of the multitude.

The origin of the term "lame duck" as applied to a defeated candidate for reelection is involved in some obscurity, but it was used in England in connection with a stock-exchange member or broker who was unable to meet his obligations and came into use in America in the way it is now commonly applied as early as the famous contest of 1800, in which the Federalist Party was overwhelmed under the leadership of Jefferson, though it was not extensively applied in the significance now given it until comparatively recent times.

It is a tribute to the disposition of the American people to yield to the judgment of the majority expressed in an election—the vital principle of a republic, as Jefferson expressed it—that the instances have been rare in which a Congress lacking a vote of confidence in the election has sought to enact general legislation, particularly along lines of which the result of the election may fairly be considered as a disapproval. Ordinarily it has been content with the passage of the general appropriation bills and measures to which there is no opposition, or at least such as have no political significance. It is likewise to their credit that they are not disposed to sanction changes in the Constitution because of embarrassing situations that may arise, and for which no adequate provision is made, but which never have arisen and, so far quate provision is made, but which never have arisen and, so far as existing conditions warrant prediction, are not likely to arise. However, when, after the election of 1922, at which the administration suffered some serious reverses, to which it was generally believed the seating of Newberry materially contributed, President Harding recommended in his annual message the enactment of a ship subsidy law, long a highly controversial measure on which division had been leggely on party lines the late Senetor Caraway. ship subsidy law, long a highly controversial measure on which division had been largely on party lines, the late Senator Caraway introduced a resolution, though that was by no means the first attempt in that direction, to effect the change in the Constitution now before the States for ratification. With characteristic wit at the expense of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which it would regularly be sent, he moved that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, where it did go and from which a substitute was offered by Senator Norris, then chairman of that committee, by whom it has ever since been championed and who has led in the struggle for its adoption. It got no further in that Congress, but being reintroduced in the next was passed by the Senate on March 18, 1924, and sent to the House, where it was ignored. It passed the Senate again in the Sixty-ninth Congress on February 15, 1926, and was then noticed by the House, so far as that it was referred to the appropriate committee, which reported a substitute, on which the House took no action.

It made further progress in that body the next time, for, having passed the Senate again on January 4, 1928, the House committee reported a substitute, on which the House took no action.

It made further progress in that body the next time, for, having passed the Senate again on January 4, 1928, the House committee again reported a substitute which was voted on in the main body but failed for lack of the necessary two-thirds vote. Nothing daunted the Senate, in the next Congress, the Seventy-first, on June 7, 1929, passed the necessary resolution, and reaching the House the next day, it was permitted to remain on the Speaker's table, not even being referred to a committee, until April 17, 1930, when it was referred to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress. In the meantime, resolutions having a like purpose had been introduced by House Members and referred to that committee which, on the 8th of April, 1930, reported one of them, the Senate resolution still reposing on the Speaker's table. It was never acted on by the committee to which it was referred, but by unanimous consent was laid before the House when it was amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the House resolution which had been reported. In this form it passed the House February 24, 1931, and was sent to conference on the very eve of the expiration of that Congress on the succeeding 4th day of March, then only eight days distant. The conferees disagreed, the difference bringing into relief the

The conferees disagreed, the difference bringing into relief the second major reform to be inaugurated by the amendment.

As proposed by the Senate the Congress would assemble immediately after the first day of January in each year, at which time the terms of the Members elected at the preceding Novemtime the terms of the Members elected at the preceding November elections would begin, and they would take their seats. The session would never come automatically to an end except by the arrival of the time for the new session. It could be brought to a close only by agreement of the two Houses, or, in the event of a disagreement between them as to the time of adjournment, by the President. Under the prevailing system, in the evennumbered years that is the condition, yet so harmonious have been the relations between the two branches of Congress thus far that the President has never been called upon to exercise his authority in that regard. But in the odd-numbered years, the Congress comes automatically to an end at noon on March 4. The result is that there is scarcely a Congress in recent years that has not come to a close with a filibuster in the Senate and a perfect bedlam in both Houses in the strife for consideration of measures, in which the contenders are interested, before the fatal hour of 12 strikes. Meritorious measures are talked to death in hour of 12 strikes. Meritorious measures are talked to death in the Senate, and worse still, amendments to bills which the body eagerly desires to see passed—often appropriation bills by which funds are provided with which to carry on the necessary functions of government—amendments wholly unjustifiable, are accepted under a threat, diplomatically expressed, to filibuster the bill to its grave unless the proposed amendments are adopted. In the House a tremendous power rests with the leaders, always including the Speaker, to say what bills shall and what shall not have con-the Speaker, to say what bins shall and what shall not have consideration and how much time may be assigned to each.

The House resolution provided that though no limit should be set to the session in the odd-numbered years, it should terminate at noon on the 4th day of May in the even-numbered years. Speaker Longworth, a most unusual thing for him, took the floor in favor of the limitation thus proposed and succeeded in having the House adopt his view. At least it voted for the substitute with the result heretofore indicated, the Senate conferees being confident that with the passage of time their attitude would be vindicated. This proved true, as the resolution again introduced in the Senate by Senator Norris on January 4, 1932, was, two days later, passed by that body and sent to the House which, on February 2, had it back from the committee with a recommendation that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and a House resolution of like import be substituted. This was done, and the resolution passed February 16, 1932. The differences being inconresolution passed February 16, 1932. The differences being inconsequential, the House no longer standing for a limit to either session, the conferees quickly agreed, and their report was adopted by the House on March 1 and by the Senate on the next day.

I have dwelt upon the details of the more recent history of the effort to institute this reform because it gives to the uninitiated a faint idea of the course most reforms depending upon congressional action must run. When every resource of parliamentary procedure to which ingenious opponents can have recourse to avert a test is exhausted, the measure is finally carried by an overwhelming vote to which Members may refer to appease stituents doubtful of their fidelity to the favored cause.

Should the amendment be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, as is probable, the regular annual session of the Congress will commence at noon on January 3, at which time the terms of the Members elected in November will begin.

At present Members elected in November, though their terms begin on the following 4th of March, do not actually sit, unless a special session is called, until 13 months after their election, during which time new issues, perhaps not thought of by the voters, may have arisen and the circumstances inducing their choice may have undergone a radical change. While it is quite customary for a new President, particularly if he comes in with a politically friendly Congress and succeeds an Executive of different political friendly Congress and succeeds an Executive of different political fath, to call promptly upon his inauguration a special session, experience shows that should the result of the election in the middle of his term be adverse he is most unlikely to assemble Congress in extraordinary session, so that the policies for which the people declared in November can not be enacted for more than a year, a situation that would be regarded as intolerable in countries operating under a parliamentary system in most, if not all, of which the newly elected Members take office forthwith.

Another merit attributed to the change is that the votes for President and Vice President cast in the Electoral College will be canyassed by the newly elected Members of Congress instead of President and Vice President cast in the Electoral College will be canvassed by the newly elected Members of Congress instead of by those whose terms (save for two-thirds of the Members of the Senate) are expiring. Conceivably the party spirit might at some time run so high that a "lame duck" Congress might "count in" a candidate favored by the then dominant party, while the successful contender and the Congressmen elected with him in a land-slide could be only interested but helpless bystanders. I say helpless, though the statute under which the Supreme Court is about to determine the right of George Otis Smith to the position of to determine the right of George Otis Smith to the position of member of the Power Commission equally authorizes a writ of quo warranto to determine the title of a claimant to the office of President of the United States.

The amendment advances the date at which the term of the President and Vice President begins and ends to January 20, the purpose being to bring it as near the date of the assembling of Congress as practicable, having in mind the necessity of counting the votes to determine who shall fill those offices. It was thought that a President who in November had been defeated at the polls should remain at the helm no longer than was necessary to de-termine who was in fact the successful candidate, the same prin-ciple being applied as in the case of Members of Congress.

An incidental result of the amendment will be to abbreviate the terms of all of the officials affected who shall be in office at the time the amendment goes into effect, each retiring on the 3d or the 20th of January, as the case may be, instead of the 4th of March of the year in which his term expires. Out of abundance of caution, the amendment also provides for the case of the death of the President elect before qualifying and for the case of the death of both President elect and Vice President elect, but these provisions are of minor consequence.

The outstanding accomplishments to be expected from the change are the removal of the peril of legislation through the action of officials who, by the acid test of the election, are out of harmony with prevailing sentiment, the avoidance of the defeat of meritorious legislation, and the enactment of measures devoid of merit if not actually harmful in the jam incident to adjournment on a day fixed by law, and finally the more prompt action toward the enactment of legislation dealing with issues involved in congressional elections. in congressional elections.

PROPOSED ECONOMIC COUNCIL-RADIO INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR LA FOLLETTE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interview of Mr. Charles G. Ross with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] over the radio on the 15th day of March, 1932.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Ross. Senator La Follette, what were the reasons that led you to introduce your bill for the establishment of an economic council a little over a year ago?

Senator La Follette. There were numerous reasons,

Senator La Follette. There were numerous reasons, but the most important one is my conviction that we must bring order out of the chaos in our economic life. As a step in that direction I introduced the bill now pending in the Manufactures Committee of the Senate. With intelligent guidance, based on essential economic facts, I am sure that we can secure a measure of planning in our business life. I believe that the unhealthy conditions of 1928 and 1929 would have been remedied and the crash that followed avoided had the people of the United States been aware of the actual state of affairs at that time.

Many of these facts could have been available had we had the machinery for collecting and disseminating them. Indeed, I attempted to bring some of the facts to public attention as far back as the winter and spring of 1928. I submitted to the Senate a resolution calling upon the Federal Reserve Board to check and reduce the enormous amount of brokers' loans being diverted from the Federal reserve system and used for speculative purposes on the Federal reserve system and used for speculative purposes on the stock exchange. I also sponsored a resolution calling for in-vestigation of the problems of unemployment. The resolution on brokers' loans was never acted upon by the Senate, but the Senate Committee on Education and Labor was authorized to study unemployment and its report revealed that despite the so-called prosperity there was, even at that time, a large number out of employment and that their ranks were constantly increasing. But even after the facts were ascertained there was no official But even after the facts were ascertained there was no official economic organization in the United States which could command public confidence to broadcast them to the country and to point out what they signified as to the future. If we had an official board whose members commanded the respect and confidence of all portions of the population, and which, fortified with the necessary information, would point out the probable trends in economic affairs, I believe that their recommendations and warnings would believe that their recommendations and warnings would affairs, I believe that their recommendations and warnings would help to bring a measure of orderly progress into what has thus far been a blind and unguided system.

Mr. Ross. Everybody seems to be talking about planning at the moment. I suppose that Russia's experiment is responsible for this trend of thought. From what you have just said, however, I take it that your council would not be of the type that Russia has set up. Its functions, as I see it, would be primarily to get the facts, digest them, and advise the country of its conclusions. Senator La FOLLETTE. The bill is not modeled on the Russian plan. It confers no such powers as that exercised in Russia to Senator La Follette. The bill is not modeled on the Russian plan. It confers no such powers as that exercised in Russia to determine what industrial activity should go on and what should not. Under its terms the task of the economic council would be to keep itself informed about economic and business conditions and to give careful consideration to the problems affecting the economic life of the country. It would endeavor also to formulate proposals looking to the solution of such problems. If, on the basis of its conclusions, it felt that congressional action was necessary, it would make recommendations for necessary legislation. From time to time, as it deemed advisable, it would submit reports dealing with specific economic problems to the President reports dealing with specific economic problems to the President and make such recommendations to him as it saw fit. Finally it would keep industry informed of its activities and its findings and submit its conclusions and recommendations to all interested groups in our economic life.

Mr. Ross. Does this mean, Senator, that your plan calls for the creation of a new Government bureau for the collection of statistical information? One hears a lot in Washington about the large number of bureaus already in existence. Indeed, it is said by many that all the necessary statistical data about our industrial system are already being collected.

Senator La Follette. The plan does not necessarily mean the establishment of a new statistical bureau in Washington. It does mean, however, that there will be created a central organization which will collect, assemble, sift out, and digest such data as are now being collected by existing public and private agencies. At the present time there is no agency in Washington charged with the responsibility of interpreting the data which are being daily collected here and elsewhere. In other words, we have a mass of all sorts of figures, but it is nobody's business to interpret them and to submit their interpretations and recommendations to the public. the public.

Now, this does not mean that the council will not at times have to become the original agency for the collecting of statistical material which is not already available. It must have the power to make first-hand investigations when it becomes necessary. This means that it must be authorized to call for such information as it feels it must have in order intelligently to do its job, and it must have the power to call witnesses and require the submission of essential documentary evidence. What I think would happen in practice is that in most cases the council would secure the cooperation of existing governmental agencies whenever it wanted certain information which was not already at

Here, by the way, I must disagree with what you say about the necessary economic information being already available. In our hearings on the bill for the creation of a national economic our hearings on the bill for the creation of a national economic council we went into the question as to what information was at hand rather carefully. We called in as an expert witness the chief of economic research of the Department of Commerce and secured from him a rather complete picture of the present state of economic statistics. We learned, for example, that our wholesale price statistics, which are generally considered to have reached a rather high degree of perfection, are really defective in very many respects. As for retail prices, the only data we have are monthly figures on certain foodstuffs and fuels and semiannual figures for certain goods that go into the budget of the wage earner. When it comes to statistics of production, the only real index we have of industrial conditions, we find that our monthly production figures cover only 50 or 60 of the standard commodities. When we remember that the census lists something approaching half a million commodities, the inadequacy of these data becomes evident. data becomes evident.

There is a great deal of discussion concerning the stocks of goods on hand and the relation of these stocks to the severity and duration of the depression. One would think that in so vital a field as this we should at least have a fairly accurate picture of the actual facts. Yet, according to expert testimony, all we have is information for certain important world commodities like coffee, rubber, and similar goods, and for the supplies of some 15 or 20 important raw materials that are on hand in certain important market centers. We know virtually nothing about the stocks of these important raw materials that are being held all along the line in the hands of dealers.

In the field of retail trade the extent of available information on stocks on hand concerns department stores, which, after all, do less than 6 per cent of the retail business of the country. And this information is in terms of dollars and not in terms of the commodities stored. We haven't the slightest idea, for instance, how many men's suits, women's dresses, radios, or vacuum cleaners are to-day in the hands of our retail merchants. A similar situation prevails in all of the other branches of economic statistics. It is a sad commentary on our statistical information that in the third winter of the depression we have absolutely no authoritative official figures on unemployment. The only data we have are those collected by the census in 1930 for the country as a whole, and for certain cities in January, 1931

Likewise, with all the talk we have heard from bankers and Likewise, with all the talk we have heard from bankers and others about the need for cutting wages and with all the actual wage cutting that has taken place, we are woefully lacking in any adequate wage statistics. Also, while we are discussing the wages of labor, it is startling that we have no accurate information on the wages which capital is taking in the form of net profits from the point of view of industry as a whole. Furthermore, do you know that we never have had any official estimate of the total national income of the United States and the only authoritative information we have to go on is the estimate of an authoritative information we have to go on is the estimate of an authoritative information we have to go on is the estimate of an unofficial agency in 1929.

With the exception of certain data on department and chain stores and mail-order houses, we know little or nothing about how much is being spent in the United States for consumers' goods. We have hardly any figures on installment credit. The figures on the cost of living do not in any way give a true picture of what is happening to the living costs of the people. Existing data are based on a budget made up of a typical family's expenditures in 1918, when few of us had automobiles, none of us had radios, when houses wired for electricity were far fewer in number; in short, when the type of family expenditures was entirely different from what it is to-day.

Mr. Ross. We have heard a lot recently about the Swope plan and the plan of the committee on the continuity of business of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. These plans, as I understand them, were also conceived for the purpose of bring-

I understand them, were also conceived for the purpose of bringing about more orderly conditions in the business world. Do you feel that they would accomplish this end as effectively as would the economic council which you propose?

Senator La Follette, I do not feel that either of the plans you mention approaches the problem from the right direction. As I understand these plans, their immediate aim is to make it possible for industry to regulate its output so that it can limit its production to the demands of the market; and while the proposal may have merit as an emergency measure in a time like this, as a permanent policy I regard it as absolutely fallacious.

as a permanent policy I regard it as absolutely fallacious.

Fundamentally the Swope and chamber of commerce plans are based on the assumption that if the manufacturers of any product could get together through trade associations or similar organizations and agree on trade and cost practices, and were allowed to collect and distribute information on the volume of business transacted, stocks of goods on hand, stabilization of production and stabilization of prices, and all other matters relating to the growth and development of their industry, each manufacturer could know from such information how much of a demand there is for the product of his industry and how much reserve stock is available to meet this demand. With this information it is said, the individual manufacturer could guide himself. mation, it is said, the individual manufacturer could guide himself

The plan of the chamber of commerce provides for the legaliza-tion of contracts whereby the members of a given industry could agree to limit their total output to a certain size and divide their production among them. Realizing that the public must be protected in the event that such contracts are made legal, provision is made for a Government agency which would have the power to abrogate such restrictive agreements when it felt that the public interest so required.

Interest so required.

As I have just stated, I believe that adjusting supply to demand is an absolutely wrong approach to a permanent solution of the problem. We must attack the problem from the point of view of increasing purchasing power. It seems to me that the trouble thus far has been that we have not increased the purchasing power of the people as rapidly as we have increased the capacity to produce. Thus we have a vicious circle in which production is limited by purchasing power and purchasing power is limited by production. We bring supply and demand together on a level that leaves a large fraction of our producing power idle. We need to break this vicious circle so that the great body of consumers will be able to buy the products we can produce. In this way we can bring supply and demand together at a point that approaches the full use of our power to turn out goods.

We have created a great industrial mechanism. It must be run the full use of our power to turn out goods.

We have created a great industrial mechanism. It must be run so that its benefits will be more generously and widely distributed. My conception of a planned economy is one which will assure an ever-increasing standard of living and an ever-increasing purchasing power for all the people. I am not interested in plans or devices which seek to maintain the status quo in our economic life. Devices designed to preserve the unequal distribution of the wealth now produced will halt the progress of mankind and in the end will retard or prevent recovery.

One of the most significant points brought out in the hearings was the fact that in the years of greatest prosperity there were 22,000,000 people in the United States living at the barest necessity level or below it. Also I was startled to learn that real wages in this country had fallen from 1923 to 1929 except in transportation and building industries. Under such conditions it is more important to make it possible for families now denied their essential needs to secure the necessities and comforts of life than it is to create machinery which makes possible the curtailment of production by agreement.

Mr. Ross. I notice, Senator, that another difference between

Mr. Ross. I notice, Senator, that another difference between your proposed council and that proposed by the United States Chamber of Commerce lies in the fact that the latter provides for a council to be appointed and financed by private industry, whereas yours is a governmental body. Do you feel that this difference is an essential one?

Senator La Follette. I believe, Mr. Ross, that a council organized and financed by private industry has inherent weaknesses.

First, no private body would have the power to collect the information which is necessary for formulating effective policies. There are many firms in the United States to-day which will not voluntarily furnish any information to anybody concerning their

There are many firms in the United States to-day which will not voluntarily furnish any information to anybody concerning their activities. Indeed, some concerns even go so far as to refuse such information to the departments of the Government. It wasn't so long ago, you know, that the Federal Trade Commission was ordered by Congress to investigate certain phases of the cost of living. In order to find out whether certain prices were out of line, the Federal Trade Commission undertook to look into the investments and profits of a few of the large industries. What happened? The members of one of the industries refused to reveal this information, and through their trade association secured a court injunction temporarily prohibiting the commission reveal this information, and through their trade association secured a court injunction temporarily prohibiting the commission from getting these facts. Their argument was that theirs was a manufacturing industry and not engaged in interstate commerce, and that the Federal Government did not have any power to demand information from firms not primarily engaged in interstate commerce.

I believe that such essential information as we should need would to-day be available to a Government body armed with the proper authority. But I want to emphasize that without such authority no agency could get the data we need. And the only agency that could be vested with such power would necessarily have to be governmental.

Secondly, our economic system involves far more than the field Secondly, our economic system involves far more than the field of industry. There are so many important factors affecting the economic life of the country which private industry, even if given the power, could not control. Many of these primary factors are wholly within the field of government. For example, there are the banking, monetary, and tax policies, which have a tremendous bearing on economic trends. There are purely governmental functions. There is the problem of Government borrowing and Government expenditure. Nor need I at this time mention the tariff. Each of these vitally affects our industrial activity. Their coordination requires the existence of an officially constituted council. They do not lie within the realm of any private organization. organization.

Finally, I feel that a council organized by the Government is preferable to one set up by private business, because if such a body is to accomplish its purpose its findings and recommendations must have the confidence of the general public. An organization in which the masses of the people have faith and for which they have respect would be far more influential in securing a measure of planned economic activity than would be the case with even the most carefully selected private group of business leaders.

Mr. Ross. Your last statement interests me greatly. Isn't there the possibility that your council, if appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, might become politically minded? Might it not be used, in other words, for promoting the fortunes of the party in power? If the American people should get the feeling that this was so, the pronouncements of a council concerning industrial policy would surely be heavily discounted.

Senator La Follette. Yes; such a thing is possible. Personally, however, I have no fears on this score. I have enough faith in our political institutions to believe that we can secure for membership on the council men of courage, integrity, ability, and high purpose, whose sole aim would be the advancement of the common good.

common good.

Mr. Ross. Is it your opinion that the men who are to constitute the council should represent specific groups in the community? Would you have representatives of labor, agriculture, banking, transportation, and similar groups on the council?

Senstor La Follerre. No; I do not feel that the members of the senstor LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not feel that the members of the council should represent any particular economic interests. It should be, rather, a body of impartial men who would not be influenced by the desires or interests of any group in making decisions and recommendations. Nevertheless, the members of the council should be thoroughly trained and qualified to consider the problems of agriculture, labor, industry, finance, transportation and scientific means the problems.

tion, and scientific management.

Mr. Ross. But to do their job effectively, would not these men have to keep in touch with the various economic groups? How would that be accomplished?

Senator La Follette. That would not be difficult. The bill specifically provides that the economic council should initiate the organization of councils or associations within the major branches of production, distribution, and finance. These bodies, as I see them, would be highly developed trade associations, representative of all the economic interests of the particular industries or groups in which they are organized. In an economic world as complex as ours is, no board is competent by itself to prescribe for all of our major industries and how they should be organized. These are problems which the different interests in the various industries must work out themselves. Obviously the problems of the steel industry are widely different from those of agriculture or coal industry are widely different from those of agriculture or coal mining. As I picture the practical working of this tie-up, the trade association would serve as the bridge between all the factors in the industries they represent and the National Economic Council. Facts, information, and matters of policy would pass from a given industry to the council by way of its trade association. Conversely, information, suggestions, and recommendations would pass from the council to the various industries and other groups through the intermediary of adequately representative associations. groups through the intermediary of adequately representative associations.

Mr. Ross. As I look at the problem of depressions, it seems

Mr. Ross. As I look at the problem of depressions, it seems that the financial aspects of our system are among the most important. I feel that there has been overinvestment and overexpansion along many important lines. Without a more intelligent guidance of our investment policy, I can not see how we can accomplish much along the lines of stability and growth. I fail to see how a national economic council, without power to control investment banking, could keep us from running into another situation similar to that of 1928 and 1929. How would your economic council affect this situation?

Senator La Follette. Suppose late in 1928 some authoritative body in Washington had publicly emphasized the fact that there

Senator La Follierre. Suppose late in 1326 some statistication body in Washington had publicly emphasized the fact that there was an excess of private houses on the market. Suppose it had pointed out that construction figures showed an appreciable falling off in the building of new houses. Surely in the light of such warnings people would not have continued investing their hard-earned savings in first and second mortgage real-estate bonds, thus increasing the supply of new capital for speculative building, which continued into 1929. Or, let us take another case, Mr. Ross. If the American public had been told on January 1, 1928, that any given industry was 150 per cent overequipped, and that it was running at 80 per cent of normal operation; and if it were told again three months later that this same industry was 160 per cent overequipped and running at 80 per cent; and six months later it was told that running at 80 per cent; and six months later it was told that the industry was 170 per cent overequipped and still running under normal capacity—do you believe that with such information broadcast through the press and the financial journals the people of this country would have invested their own funds or have borrowed money from the banks to purchase securities for the erection of new plants in that industry? Or do you think that if any banker had on his desk an official statement that a certain industry already had an overcapacity of 100 per cent he would loan money to put up another factory to produce the same would loan money to put up another factory to produce the same products?

I am not one of those who believe that the American people refuse to follow reason. Thus far they have not had the facts upon which to base sound judgment. It has been hit or miss; following this tip or that one. I believe that with the publication of adequate and disinterested information the general public will become sufficiently informed so that they will not swallow misleading refuse approximation investment, approximations.

lic will become sufficiently informed so that they will not swallow misleading statements concerning investment opportunities.

Mr. Ross. What you have told me is very informative, Senator. Now I should like to ask one final question. What is the present status of your bill for the creation of an economic council?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. It is pending in the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate. The committee has not yet taken action. I hope, however, that there will be an opportunity to discuss the bill on the floor of the Senate before this session adjourns.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF WALTER HINES PAGE

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD certain letters, remarks, and editorials relating to the commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Walter Hines Page, late American ambassador to the Court of St.

The celebration of the anniversary of the birth of Mr. Page took place at the little town of Cary, N. C., the place of his nativity.

The matter that I ask to have inserted in the RECORD is brief and consists of, first, telegrams from President Hoover and former Secretary of State Kellogg; second, letters from Senators Simmons and Overman and other Members of Congress and from other distinguished public leaders; third, two short editorials from leading newspapers in North Carolina; fourth, remarks by Lord Grey, former British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and a letter signed jointly by Lord Grey and four former British Prime Ministers, to wit, A. Bonar Law, Lord Balfour, H. H. Asquith, and David Lloyd George, in connection with the ceremonies at the unveiling of a marble tablet in honor of Mr. Page in Westminster Abbey on July 3, 1923; and, fifth, remarks of Dr. W. P. Few, president of Duke University, at the Cary celebration of Mr. Page's birthday anniversary.

Mr. Page was one of North Carolina's greatest sons. His public services, not only as a diplomat during a crucial period but also as an internationally known editor, author, and publicist, were of such tremendous value, and his ability and character so outstanding, that I feel justified in asking that these deserved tributes to his life and career upon the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth may be printed in the Congressional Record.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad to learn that the citizens of Cary, N. C., are preparing to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of my good friend the late Walter Hines Page. He was a great ambassador and a great patriot, whose many public services have contributed permanently not only to better international understanding but also to the causes of education and social advancement in the United States. I am glad of the occasion to express my admiration and States. I am glad of the occasion to express my admiration and affection for him.

During the trying period of the Great War Mr. Page was appointed as American ambassador to London in 1913. And the following year found him confronted with an almost insurmountable task in maintaining this country's true position in the European war. For years Mr. Page worked ceaselessly and fearlessly for his Government until, owing to his health, he was forced to resign his high post. He was a martyr to his country's cause and a hero whose great service will ever be appreciated and whose name will go down in the annals of his country as a noble and faithful servant to a great cause."

UNITED STATES SENATE, New Bern, N. C., August 14, 1930.

My Dear Mr. Chairman: I deeply regret I am unable to attend the meeting at Cary in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Walter Hines Page and to participate in these exercises as well as express my personal respect, admiration, and pride in the life, achievements, and fame of my college mate and life-long friend.

Mr. Page by reason of his splendid attainments, sterling qualties, and ability achieved not only national but international distinction and eminence as a man and citizen, scholar and author, diplomet and statement diplomat, and statesman.

The career and fame of this great son of North Carolina should be cherished with abiding pride not only by the people of his native town of Cary but by his native State and the Nation.

I shall be pleased to have you read this letter and to express my full accord and sympathy with the objects and purposes of the meeting.

My Dear Mr. Templeton: Your letter of the 23d has been received, and in reply I regret to inform you that I will not be able to be present at the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Walter Hines Page on August 15. I wish it were possible, for Page was one of the greatest men who have gone forth from this State to serve the Nation and the world, and we should not be true to the best that is North Carolina if we falled to keep alive his memory and forgot the things he fought for so valiantly, so brilliantly, so sympathetically. Many misunderstood him, but now we know that he had a passionate love for North Carolina and its people, and that all that he did and said and wrote was done and said and written to advance their best interest as he saw it.

My Dear Mr. Templeton: I had hoped that I would be able to be present on August 15 to join with you in tribute to the great honor that has come to our State, and to Cary especially, in the page and fame of Hon. Walter Hipes sharing with the Nation the name and fame of Hon. Walter Hines Page. In honoring him we honor our State, for no man has gone out from among us with greater vision and greater capacity to get the right things done.

With assurance of my best wishes and for a happy commemorating service to one of North Carolina's great citizens, I am,

Sincerely yours,

Mr. J. M. TEMPLETON, Jr.,

Raleigh, N. C.

My Dear Templeton: I have delayed replying to your good letter of July 2 until I could get somewhat more completely in sight of the demands of my schedule for August.

As I told you when we discussed this, it would give me genuine pleasure to have some part in this commemorative celebration. My fondness for several of the living members of the Page family, together with my conviction that Walter Hines Page was one of the greatest men that North Carolina has ever produced, is sufficient to explain my interest. On the other hand, I do not believe that I can possibly reconcile my engagements so as to be here at that time. I have engagements immediately before and after this date which will take me out of Raleigh, and I frankly do not see how I can be here except at a physical hardship which would be almost unreasonable to undergo. I therefore feel that I must decline this invitation but I do hope that you will understand that I have not done so except upon what appears to me to be the most compelling reasons. be the most compelling reasons.

With every good wish and warm personal regards, I am, Cordially yours,

My Dear Friend: I wish to thank you for the invitation to be present and to join others in talks on the life of Walter Hines Page.

North Carolina and the whole of America are proud of his great record. I hope to be able to be present, but in the event that I can not be it will afford me pleasure to write a letter as suggested by you.

With best wishes, I remain, sincerely yours,

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

DEAR MR. TEMPLETON: Walter Hines Page's usefulness to me was so great that I am tempted to think of him more as a friend than as a statesman. He was the only editor I ever knew who could really teach young men his trade. When I left college Mr. Page was kind enough to set me to come as his explorer him. was kind enough to ask me to come as his assistant, but the Atlantic was at that time too small a raft to keep two afloat, and with infinite regret I determined to paddle my own canoe. But during all the years of his American editorships I went to him frequently for advice and always got it, helpfully and pun-gently.

He had a wonderful way of giving concrete expression to an abstract idea, and he was the only man I ever knew whose modernity was definitely accentuated by intimacy with the classics of Greece. He had a clear conception of history and saw behind all the problems of contemporary life the busy workings of the past. I never knew him too occupied to give help and counsel, and he had the gift—which a man now growing old always can look back upon and appreciate—of inspiring confidence in a boy that he holds his future in his hand.

Of course, his southern birth helped him. He understood the two sections of his country as few men of his generation, and they made him the complete type of American he was. He enjoyed his life to the full and died fighting, as he would have wished. I wish he could have known that years after he had gone the citizens of his birthplace would combine to do him honor.

Yours sincerely,

Yours sincerely.

DEAR MR. TEMPLETON: It is a pleasure to send you a word in appreciation of Walter Hines Page from the editorial offices of the magazine he founded. Mr. Page had that rare combination of qualities, a humanness that made it possible for him to enjoy the society of the humble and at the same time the greatness that made it easy for him to move in the society of the exalted. Both classes were equally pleased with his understanding and real liking. When Page became ambassador this country lost a great editor, but his services as diplomatic representative of this country were even greater than his usefulness as an editor. We who

We are proud to carry on the ideals and the ideas on which World's Work was founded, and we hope that his spirit will continue to live in the magazine for many years to come. First as a subordinate, later as a partner, and always proud in having his friendship, I am particularly glad to send this note.

THE UNIVERSITY CLUB, August 2, 1930.

DEAR MR. TEMPLETON: I greatly regret that I can not come to Cary on August 15 to pay a personal tribute to the memory of Walter Hines Page. I am most impressed by the fitness of observing this anniversary. The fact that Walter Page spent his early years in your community should always be an inspiration to good citizenship and the highest personal and political ideals. I realize, perhaps better than most, what his life in Cary meant to him. Among your people he absorbed many of the conceptions and purposes to which he subsequently devoted his life. It was to Cary that in his last illness in England his thoughts constantly returned. His one desire was to return again to the scenes of his that in his last illness in England his thoughts constantly returned. His one desire was to return again to the scenes of his childhood, to see once more the places that, in spite of all his wanderings, he still regarded as his home. The world now claims Walter Page as its citizen. In England he is held in an affection that is seldom accorded to one of British birth. These Northern States in which he passed his years of maturity regard him almost as a native son. All these sympathies Page returned, yet in the deepest recesses of his heart he was a southerner and a North Carolinian. In your anniversary, therefore, I hope Cary will keep this loyalty of Page to his native soil foremost in mind. What the little town of Cary did for him and meant to him should never be forgotten. Very sincerely yours, BURTON J. HENDRICK.

Dear Sir: I have just received your letter of August 9, inviting my participation in the exercises held by Cary, N. C., in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Ambassador Page on August 15. I very greatly regret that my absence from home precluded my having any part in that tribute to a great representative of our people.

Yours very singerely.

When the late Frank Page, Captain Guess, Rufus and Adolphus Jones, and other high-class Christian citizens secured the incorporation of Cary they stipulated in the charter that intoxicants should never be made or sold in that town, and they named it for Mr. Cary, an eloquent temperance evangelist.

Last night the people of that good Wake County town, upon the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth, paid honor to the late Ambassador Walter Hines Page, who was born in Cary and always kept a warm place in his heart for the place of his birth. Indeed, when he was editor of the State Chronicle he made his residence there and commuted to and from Raleigh. Tributes from President Hoover and other distinguished of the earth were paid to Cary's ablest citizen. These tributes told of his brilliancy as a writer, as a teacher, as an orator, and the great place he occuas a writer, as a teacher, as an orator, and the great place he occupied in world affairs when he served as ambassador to Great Britain during the administration of Woodrow Wilson. It was a notable occasion in honor of a notable and distinguished son of

CARY CELEBRATES ANNIVERSARY OF ITS APOSTLE OF FREEDOM

Cary, home site of the Pages of North Carolina, did well in celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of that one of a famous family who became known to the world at large.

Walter Hines Page's record as ambassador to Great Britain gave and will continue to give rise to controversy, but that he displayed remarkable qualities of diplomacy and that he powerfully affected the relations between the two great English-speaking nations in the time of acute crisis will never be denied. It was charged against Mr. Page, with a good deal of evidence in support, that from the beginning of the World War he was pro-British. But if so, the fact only meant that he saw earlier and more clearly the necessity which more cautious politicians on this side of the water were brought to face in the end. In the difficult period when Great Britain was interfering with American shipping it was he who made possible adjustment after adjustment until the time came for a final pooling of interests, he who made possible adjustment after adjustment until the time came for a final pooling of interests.

As a southerner and a man of letters, Mr. Page also showed the quality of being in advance of the times. In his books, articles, and in speeches he preached a new South in the intellectual as well as the industrial sense. In this he shocked at one time the people among whom he had vainly tried to make headway as a journalist in his youth. He preached the righteousness of clear and direct thinking, the elimination of taboos, the forgetting of prejudice. The State that later came to sing his praises was in the middle of the first decade of the twentieth century in a perfect frenzy of resentment of his phrase to the effect that the South was being led among stagnant pools of theology.

It is a major part of Mr. Page's achievements, if little remembered, that he was largely responsible for the fact that the man in the South who has something to say and something to think can now deliver himself of his burden without fear of political or religious lynching.

[Editorial in the Charlotte News, Sunday, August 17, 1930] A GREAT NORTH CAROLINIAN

August 15, the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Walter Hines Page, was celebrated at Cary, his birthplace, with appropriate and fitting tribute to this most celebrated North Carolinian. It is doubtful, to our mind, that the place of Page in history is held in as much distinction in his native State as is its right. held in as much distinction in his native State as is its right. His contribution to affairs was made nationally, rather than through participation in State matters alone, and his activities led him far afield from the place of his birth. While remaining essentially a North Carolinian, his life and letters were dedicated to a larger sphere, with the result that his greatness has falled to receive due recognition from the State on which it reflects.

It might prove of benefit for North Carolinians in general to study the life of this man, and to read his letters in published form, in order that his accomplishment and his place in history may be fully appreciated.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF WALTER H. PAGE (By Burton J. Hendrick, Vol. III, pp. 427-431)

Great Britain has also paid tribute to the man who believed that in acting as her friend and the friend of the allied cause he was best serving his own country and the world. Soon after the publication of the Page biography, the following letter, signed by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, three former Prime Ministers, and a former Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs appeared in the a former secretary of state for Foreign Analis appeared in the London Times:

"Sir: The publication of the two admirably edited volumes of The Life and Letters of Walter H. Page has revealed to the world a personality and a record of achievement, of which, perhaps, only those who came into intimate social and official contact with him during the term of his ambassadorship in this country were him during the term of his ambassatoramp in the dearest already aware.

"In these 'letters' Mr. Page lives again. They give the clearest and widest expression we can ever now hope to receive of his vivid, free-ranging mind and of that mellow integrity of character and abounding humanity which endeared him to us all. More particularly, they show him to have been one of the best friends that Great Britain ever had, and a far-seeing and practical crusader in the cause of Anglo-American cooperation.

"In the difficult period of the war, before the United States had entered it, and when many contentious issues inevitably arose between the British and American Governments, it was Mr. Page's handling of these issues, as much as any other factor, that kept them within the bounds of reason and good temper. Scrupulous, as an ambassador should be in presenting his country's case with all the vigor and persuasiveness at his command, Mr. Page's conduct of the negotiations entrusted to him was informed throughout by his native courtesy, humor, and straightforwardness; by a quick understanding of the nature of the European struggle; and by an intensity of sympathy for the allied cause and of admiration for Great Britain's part in it which was irrepressible. He was the happiest, the most liberated man in Europe when America entered the war.

"For all that Mr. Page contributed toward that supreme development, by smoothing away friction and minimizing and removing difficulties and misunderstandings, this country, no less than his own, owes him an inestimable debt. There must, moreover, be many hundreds of our people who used his services and those of his most efficient staff to inquire after the fate of relatives at the fronts, and who drew freely and gratefully on his exhaustless stock of sympathy, patience, and promptitude.

tives at the fronts, and who drew freely and gratefully on his exhaustless stock of sympathy, patience, and promptitude.

"There is nothing in Great Britain to mark the fact that Mr. Page lived here for five years as United States ambassador, and that in a great crisis he served his own country and ours, and civilization itself, with a noble competence. We desire to repair that omission. We confidently invite subscriptions to perpetuate a name and services that can never be thought of, on either side of the Atlantic, without deep affection and gratitude.

"GREY OF FALLODON."

The response from all classes of British life was immediate.

The response from all classes of British life was immediate. The opinion was unanimous that there was only one place in Great Britain for a memorial to Page—that was Westminster Abbey. On July 3, 1923, a gathering which completely filled the ancient structure attended services in memory of the ambassador. A few minutes before this service Mrs. Walter H. Page, the ambassador's widow, and other members of the Page family gathered with the Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, Mr. H. H. Asquith, Mr. Winston Churchill, Lord Lansdowne, and others in the chapter house of the abbey to unveil a marble tablet in Page's honor.

The following remarks were made by Lord Grey:

"The tablet that is to be unveiled to-day is in memory of one whose every word and act in great place were inspired by singleminded and earnest desire to make human freedom, as he saw it realized in democracy, prevail among the nations of the world. Walter Hines Page was an example of the truth that the strongest personalities are the outcome not so much of striving for personal success or fame as of patriotism and of faith in an ideal. His patriotism was of the noblest kind; he loved his country both for what it was and for what he believed it could and would do for the benefit of mankind. His perception of the power of the United States, his belief in its democracy, his absolute and neverfaltering trust in the will of its people to do great things and good things for the world were part of his very being.

"Surely it must be a proud as well as a happy thought for his country to remember that it inspired a faith so high in a mind so keen and pure.

"I have spoken first of Walter Hines Page as an American, be-country to remember that it inspired a faith so high in a mind so keen and pure.

"I have spoken first of Walter Hines Page as an American, because that is how, I am sure, he would have wished us to speak of him and to think of him; but it was very near his heart that there should be between his country and ours true knowledge and understanding each of the other; and there is no greater consummation to be wished for in public affairs than that the high and beneficial hopes for the world which he founded upon this should be realized.

"We in this country feel deep gratitude to him; we wish that there should be something to commemorate the sympathy and moral support that he gave us in the greatest crisis of our history. We wish his name to be remembered with regard, with honor, and with affection, as that of one who gave us invaluable help at a time when our liberty, our very independence even, seemed to be at stake.

"His countrymen who still cherish the names of those who helped the United States years ago in time of trial and peril will find it easy to understand that we here now feel for such men as Walter Hines Page. In all conversations with him I felt—what I am sure many others here who knew him also felt—that there was am sure many others here who knew him also felt—that there was between him and us a peculiarly close tie of personal sympathy. We felt attached to him by a sense of the same values in public life, by a desire for the same sort of world in which to live, by a kinship of thought, of standards, and of ideals. Therefore, while his resting place is in his own country, which he loved so devotedly, we have wished to have a memorial here to do honor to him and to preserve for those who come after us a record and memory of his life. It is most fitting that the place for this should be Westminster Abbey—where so much that is great and honorable and dear in our history is consecrated—this abbey, which not so very long ago, as time is reckoned in the life of nations, was as much part of the inheritance of his ancestors as of our own. In this spirit I unveil the memorial and ask the dean to accept it."

Lord Grey then unveiled the tablet, which bears the following

"To the glory of God and in memory of Walter Hines Page, 1855-1918, Ambassador of the United States of America to the Court of St. James, 1913-1918. The friend of Britain in her sorest need."

W. P. Few, president of Duke University, speaking August 15, on the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Walter H. Page, at Cary, N. C.:

"When I first knew Mr. Page he was editor of the Atlantic Monthly and lived in Cambridge, Mass., not far from the campus of Harvard University, where I was a student in the graduate school. I was a good many times a guest in his home and was the recipient of many courtesies at his hands, both then and in later years. He procured for me, through Mr. Scudder, the opportunity to edit a book for the old Houghton Mifflin Co., an opportunity which I did not avail myself of, for I had then come to Durham and had already renounced my ambition for a scholar's career in the interest of building educational institutions and causes in this part of America, which appealed strongly to me just as it appealed to Mr. Page.

"I give this detail because it is typical of Mr. Page. He was always helping young and struggling men and women, and though a true American and before the end a distinguished world citizen, he had a lifelong interest in the Southern States, and particularly his native State of North Carolina. You therefore do well here in the community where he was born to cherish and make much of his memory, his example, and his world-wide fame. It is Cary's crown of glory; it is one of North Carolina's chief glories to have given Walter H. Page to the Nation and to the world.

"Our people did not always understand him. He had that rarest sort of love for his people that made him willing to tell them disagreeable truths and take the consequences. This is still the acid test of a man—'If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue.' Mr. Page had this courage to an extraordinary degree, and we now know well that this was a chief element in his greatness. And if enough of us will follow his example, it will make us great as a Commonwealth, just as it made him great as a man.

ness. And if enough of us will follow his example, it will make us great as a Commonwealth, just as it made him great as a man.

"He was once a student in Trinity College (since 1924 a part of Duke University) and he was not satisfied with it. When I knew him in Cambridge he and I both had particular interests in the English department at Harvard. I know he was not satisfied with that. If he were this autumn entering Trinity College or Harvard College he would not be satisfied with either. He was too much influenced by the 'beautiful idealisms of excellence' ever to be satisfied with anything that had been handed down to us from the fathers, believing as he did that there was some better thing provided for us and 'that they without us should not be made perfect.'

thing provided for us and 'that they without us should not be made perfect.'

"We at Duke University join you of his native place in honor and gratitude for Walter Hines Page, one of the greatest men our State has ever produced. We want one of our new buildings at Duke forever to bear the name of Page, in Walter Page's memory and in memory of noble young Allison Page, his nephew, and the first of our undergraduates to give his young and beautiful life on a battle field in France, moved by the same impulse that moved Mr. Page himself to give his life for what they each alike counted the high causes of mankind."

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDING OFFICER, J. M. TEMPLETON, JR.

My fellow citizens, we are gathered to commemorate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth in this community of that dis-tinguished American and representative of the English-speaking ice, Walter Hines Page.

Perhaps it is not inappropriate to mention that during this year the western world is memorializing the bimillennial anniversary of the birth of the great poet Virgil, and in our own State recently the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of that great North Carolinian, Zebulon Bayard Vance, was observed with fitting

Further inducement for this occasion is found in the great inquest conducted this year in the fourteenth decennial census, the results of which are just being announced, which shows that North Carolina, with no natural resources discovered like gold or oil, had the unrivalled growth in population of more than 610,000 people, with corresponding advantages and assets. Mr. Page as the herald and evangelist of popular education deserves as much credit as anyone for this great record. His memorable utterance, "All wealth is but the creation of man, and he only creates it in proportion to the trained uses of the community, so that the more men we train the more wealth may everyone create," was the platform of this achievement.

And finally, my friends, let us find warrant for this occasion in these words of Mr. Page's accredited biographer, Mr. Burton J. Hendrick, "I realize, perhaps better than most, what his life in Cary meant to him. Among your people he absorbed many of the conceptions and purposes to which he subsequently devoted his life. It was to Cary that in his last illness in England his thoughts constantly returned. His one desire was to return again to the scenes of his childhood to see once more the places that, in spite of all his wanderings, he still regarded as his home. The world now claims Walter Page as its citizen. In England he is held in an affection that is seldom accorded to one of British birth. These Northern States in which he passed his years of maturity regard him almost as a native son. All these sympathies Page returned, yet in the deepest recesses of his heart he was a southerner and a North Carolinian."

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to inquire who made the motion to recommit the appropriation bill now pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to offer an amendment to that motion.

Mr. JONES. I have not asked that the motion be laid before the Senate. I want to have that done, however, as soon as possible.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like, for the information of the Senate, to present my proposed amendment at the present time.

Mr. JONES. If no one else desires to interrupt, I ask that the motion to recommit may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending question.

Mr. JONES. That is the pending question.

Mr. DICKINSON. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Tennessee by adding the following:

And that all bills making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, shall be reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate with a reduction of 10 per cent below the amount carried by such bills as passed by the House, and that all amendments offered on the Senate ficor which would have the effect of increasing the total in excess of said amount shall be subject to a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What the Senator from Iowa proposes can not be done—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A portion of the amendment would be contrary to the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would be a violation of the rules and work a change of the rules without the customary procedure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair will hold that a portion of the amendment can not be entertained, as it is in violation of the rules. The question is on agreeing to the motion offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what was done with the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A certain portion of it the Chair declined to entertain, inasmuch as it involves an amendment to the rules.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in view of a decision of the Chair, I move as an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that all appropriation bills reported to the Senate by the Senate Appropriations Committee shall be reported at a figure 10 per cent below the amount carried by the bills as passed by the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to that, and will accept it as a part of my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state his understanding of the parliamentary situation. The Chair understands the Senator from Tennessee to have accepted the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa with reference to the wording of the motion—

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is not subject to a point of order, I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last amendment suggested by the Senator is not subject to a point of order. It applies, as the Chair understands, to all appropriation bills hereafter reported, so that there are two—

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what I understand the Senator from Iowa to propose.

Mr. DICKINSON. I propose that the amendment shall apply to all appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So that there is a divisible question before the Senate if any Senator wishes to have it divided.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, the proposition now is to make the motion of the Senator from Tennessee apply to every appropriation bill during the remainder of the session?

Mr. McKELLAR. Every appropriation bill that may be considered hereafter during the session.

Mr. JONES. And including the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the motion before the Senate now to be the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, to the effect that the pending bill is to be recommitted to the committee with instructions to reduce the appropriations 10 per cent below the aggregate of the figures contained in the bill as it came to the Senate from the House, and that all appropriation bills hereafter reported shall contain a similar reduction.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I hope the motion will be divided, for the reason that if it should be adopted in its present form it would affect the second deficiency bill, and it might be absolutely impossible to apply the motion to that bill,

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is a practical consideration which I think ought to be looked at by the Senate in dealing with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. The House of Representatives has not as yet passed several of the other appropriation bills. That body is reducing the appropriations very substantially, and it is my impression that the process of reduction there is likely to be accentuated and is certain to be continued. For that reason, I am going to suggest to the Senator from Iowa the propriety of withdrawing the amendment he has proposed. We can not deal with a bill that has not reached the Senate; it is a parliamentary impracticability to provide now that, no matter what reductions the House may make in future bills, we propose automatically to reduce them 10 per cent without any further consideration.

Upon mature thought, I do not believe the Senate should enter into such an arrangement; I think it will prove detrimental in the long run and obstructive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that, technically, the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa has passed out of that Senator's hands and is now in the hands of the Senator from Tennessee, having been made a part of his motion.

Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see the force of the objection that has been raised. When the matter first came up it struck me in this way: I expected to make the motion to recommit with reference to each appropriation bill as it came up, and I thought, Why take several bites at the same cherry. However, upon reflection, I am inclined to believe that it will be better if the course I desire to take were taken as to each individual bill. Of course it would not do so far as deficiency appropriations are concerned, and furthermore it would not do for us to anticipate the action of the House. For that reason I am going to ask to further amend my motion by striking out the amendment which has been offered and accepted.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield until we can have this matter straightened out.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I simply wanted to show the folly of the method of procedure which the Senate is adopting by recommitting appropriation bills with a certain yardstick with reference to reductions. If it is good for one bill, why is it not good for all; and if it is good for the committee, why is it not good for the Senate? It is for that reason that I wanted to make it permissible to raise a point of order when an amendment was offered which would have the effect of increasing the appropriations contained in the bill above the 10 per cent limitation.

As a matter of fact, I voted against the other motion to recommit, and I expect to vote against the pending motion to recommit. I do not believe it is the proper thing for the Senate to do. In my judgment, if there are any items in this appropriation bill that ought to be reduced, the Senate ought to have the courage to study the bill and reduce them on the floor, and not turn the bill back with a 10 per cent blanket clause for reduction.

Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment to the amend-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the consent of the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Tennessee modifies his motion so that the question before the Senate is the question of recommitting the bill with instructions.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am going to take just a little of the time of the Senate. I desire to call attention to what the Senate is proposing to do. Of course, if the Senate desires to do that thing, and considers it well to do it, it is all right with me. I am a Senator just the same as anybody else here, and I am no more responsible than any other Senator, except as I have charge of the bill that the Senate is considering.

What is it proposed to do? It is proposed to take an appropriation bill and send it back to the committee and direct the committee to report a bill carrying a total that is 10 per cent below the total amount carried by the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. In other words, the Senate says that all of the amendments of the Senate committee are set aside, and the Senate will take this bill as it passed the House, cut down by 10 per cent. If the Senate desires to do that in the face of what has been done with regard to this bill, that is for the Senate to determine.

How has this bill been handled so far?

In the first place, all the items in the bill have been considered by the department that is primarily interested, and that probably knows more about the details of the various items than any other part of the Government. Then the items have gone to the Budget Bureau; and the Budget Bureau, as I understand, in connection with the department, has considered every item very carefully, and has cut out some and accepted others and finally agreed upon what it felt it should refer to Congress.

This estimate by the Budget Bureau, concurred in by the department, has come to the House of Representatives, a coordinate branch of the Government. What action has it taken? What has it done in regard to this bill? Has it partment of the Government, and just arbitrarily say, "You acted hastily? Has it taken these items and said, "These items must be reduced, regardless of the merits"?

The House of Representatives has referred this bill to its committee. Its committee has gone over every item in the bill. It has investigated every one of them, as the hearings will show. It has passed upon the reasons for the item and has passed upon the reasons against it. It has had before it the representatives of the department, who know more about each item than anybody else. It has accepted some; it has rejected others. It has lowered many; and then the committee has reported the result of its consideration to the

That does not end the matter. The bill has been considered by the House of Representatives one item at a time. Paragraph by paragraph it has been discussed and finally acted upon by the House of Representatives.

Then the bill has come to the Senate. It has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. What was the conduct of that committee?

In the first place, we have made it a rule to ask each department whether or not the bill as it has passed the House is satisfactory or whether there are any objections, whether anything can be cut out, whether it can be reduced in any way. Here is a copy of the letter sent to the committee by the Secretary of State in reply to a letter to him. I hope Senators will pay attention to this:

I thank you for your letter of February 19, 1932, asking me to indicate the changes which I think absolutely necessary and my reasons for such changes in the bill (H. H. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year June 30, 1933.

In regard to the hope you express that I can point out some items in the House bill that can be omitted or further reduced— I expressed that hope in the letter to the Secretary of

I desire to say that I fully appreciate the necessity for reducing appropriations under present conditions as far as may be done consistently with the public interest. It was in this spirit that the estimates for the Department of State for 1933 when submitted to the Bureau of the Budget showed a reduction of nearly $1,000,000 below the amounts requested by those in immediate charge of the various activities of the department.

In other words, the request of those who were especially interested and especially acquainted with these various matters was taken by the Department of State itself and cut down nearly a million dollars.

In collaboration with the Bureau of the Budget a further reduction of over a million dollars was made. The House of Representatives has made a still further reduction-

They have made it as we propose to make it. They have not made this reduction simply by an arbitrary cut. They have made the reduction, as I said a while ago, by going over, item by item, all of the proposed appropriations.

The House of Representatives has made a still further reduction of $1,492,212.77, so that the amount carried by the appropriation bill now pending in the House of Representatives is $3,174,214.22 below the amount appropriated for the current year. While I have every desire to cooperate with the Congress to the fullest extent, I do not feel that in justice to the responsibilities resting upon this department and the Foreign Service I can suggest further reductions. On the contrave ther reductions. On the contrary-

This is a responsible official of the Government, the head of one of the great departments of the Government. He is just as much interested in saving money as we are. He has to look after the interests of the Government, however, in the particular matter that he is looking into. He says:

I do not feel that in justice to the responsibilities resting upon this department and the Foreign Service I can suggest further reductions. On the contrary, I deem it my duty to recommend several increases over the amounts in the House bill.

The representatives of the various departments covered by this bill have written to us similar letters. Similar action has been taken with reference to the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Labor.

What are we to do? Are we to take this bill, which has been so carefully considered in every detail by every demust cut off 10 per cent below what you have been presenting to the United States Senate?"

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Take the very first item in the bill, of $1,915,540 in the office of the Secretary of State. That item in the last five years has grown in this way: In 1928 we appropriated $1,039,000; in 1929, $1,045,000; in 1930, $1,340,000; and for the fiscal year 1933 it has jumped up to $1,915,000. In other words, if we follow the recommendations of the department itself, we increase this item for doing virtually the same work from $1,000,000 to $1,900,000, or nearly double.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss these different items, so far as that is concerned, except to say that this Government has developed in the last five years in every activity in which we are engaged. It has increased very greatly. Notwithstanding that fact, the State Department, as they say in the letter, recognizing the condition of things that confronts the country, in the face of the increases that we made and the activities that we enlarged when times were good, are themselves making such reductions as they feel they consistently can make with the welfare of the Government at heart just as much as we have it at heart.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says that the activities of the Government have increased in the last five years. The principal activity for the last two or three years has been a depression; and it seems to me that now, of all times, we should conserve our resources, and not appropriate extravagantly, as recommended by the department.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I recognize the force of that argument, as far as that is concerned. That is an argument which every Senator should consider; but the question is whether we will make anything by this haphazard way of reducing appropriations. It is a haphazard way. It can not help but be that, and it may do more harm than good, although undoubtedly it tends toward reducing expenditures.

I desire to call attention to this matter to which the Senator has just called attention in the Department of State.

Mr. McKELLAR. What page?

Mr. JONES. On page 2 of the bill, under the Department of State, for the Secretary's office, for the current year the appropriation is $1,960,588. The estimate that came in for the coming fiscal year was $1,975,000-just a little increase over last year. That was cut down by the House to $1,915,540. There is not any question but that the House is just as anxious for economy as we are; and considering the condition of the country and considering the absolutely imperative needs of this department, it cut down the amount to $1,915,540. We have not changed that. We have no facts, no justification, in my judgment, for an arbitrary 10 per cent reduction. The item might stand that reduction. I think the Senate ought to determine, upon consideration of that item alone, what ought to be cut there, and in the same way it ought to determine what other items ought to be cut.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it has seemed to me that this motion was not presented at the right stage of the proceedings. I have the feeling that the Senate itself should perfect this bill before it seeks to send it back to the committee. The Senate should share the responsibility for the changes which are made. I am inclined to vote for such a motion at some time or other, but I do not think we should adopt it until we have made the effort in the Senate to make such changes in the bill as would result in ultimate economy.

Frankly, I feel that it is not fair to the committee to send the bill back to the committee, and ask them arbitrarily to cut 10 per cent from the aggregate. It might well be that in the discussion on the floor we might find that we could make greater reductions than 10 per cent in the total, but we should not evade the responsibility resting upon us to perfect the bill, and we should not be stampeded into doing something which may retard government, which may interfere seriously with the operation of government.

Every one of us wants to have economy, and rigid economy, practiced, but we can not evade our own individual responsibility as Members of the Senate to inspect and study, analyze, and, if possible, reduce the proposals. That is the way I feel about it.

I wish this motion of the Senator from Tennessee might come at a later time, after the Senate itself has had an opportunity to see what it can do with the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senator from New York to another fact. I agree with him to a great extent, if not entirely. But suppose we go on considering the various appropriation bills, and then have similar motions, as we had as to the Interior Department bill. We would do away with everything we had done. It does not mean the reduction of 10 per cent in the bill as reported by the Senate committee. It means a reduction of the bill by 10 per cent below what the figures were as the bill passed the House, without consideration of any amendment we may have considered, or any matters which the Secretary of State may have suggested to our committee which we ought to add to the bill. I think the Senator's suggestions are exactly what we ought to follow.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I want to make a further suggestion. The Senate spent several days in considering the Interior Department appropriation bill. The time was wasted, for the reason that we have to go back and begin all over. If the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate is to be commanded to reduce the appropriations 10 per cent below what the House allowed, then we ought to know it in advance, and the motion ought to be made when the bill first comes on to the floor, or there ought to be a general resolution adopted by the Senate, and then we would be prepared when a bill came on the floor.

One thing more. I hope every Senator who votes in the affirmative on this motion to recommit will take that fact into consideration when amendments are offered on the floor of the Senate to increase the appropriations, as will be the case if the bill comes back to the floor of the Senate carrying 10 per cent reductions all along the line, as the Senate is about to command. I do not see how any Senator can vote to send the bill back to the committee and, when it is reported back and comes on the floor of the Senate, vote to increase any item in the bill which will increase the total. That is the reason why I made the suggestion in my previous remarks.

Mr. JONES. I was just about to suggest that situation to the Senate. Suppose we send the bill back to the committee under this motion, and the committee does the best it can, and strikes down items here and there and vonder without any special consideration, because this reduction resolution is being passed upon without any special consideration. We cut out items so as to comply with the Senate's order, and then the bill comes back to the Senate. No Senator would be prevented from offering an amendment. No Senator would be prevented from proposing that an increase be made, or that a new item be put into the bill, or anything of the sort. The motion would simply bind the committee and direct that we must report the bill back to the Senate with the aggregate reduced 10 per cent below the figures sent over by the House, and then the Senate could consider it in whatever way it pleased, amendments being offered, which would be in order, of course. Senators may offer amendments of various kinds and the Senate can disregard its instructions to the committee. There will be no instructions then. The Senate, of course, is a body to itself. It can put on as much as it pleases and take off as much as

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to call attention to the situation we are in with the Interior Department appropriation bill. The House passed the Interior Department appropriation bill, it came over to the Senate, and the Senate added approximately $4,000,000 to it. Then came the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to reduce the bill 10 per cent. below the amount the House appropriated. In other words, there were all the increases put on in the Senate, which must be taken out or an equivalent amount taken out of some other part of the bill. That is the situation.

It seems to me the Senator from Washington is perfectly correct; if this plan is to be carried out and applied to the bill as it passed the House, that is what we want to know. Then we will go at the matter the best we can, and if the order of the Senate can be complied with we will report the bill to the Senate, and if it can not be we will come to the Senate and say so.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a word or two more and I will be through. I think the Senate clearly appreciates the situation which confronts us—appreciates what is proposed to be done.

If the Senate says to the Committee on Appropriations, "You must cut the appropriations 10 per cent below the House figures," the committee will do that. The bill will come back to this body. It will again be for the approval or disapproval of the Senate. It will then be open to amendment, just the same as it is now. It does seem to me that the right course for us to take is to consider the bill, with the amendments which are proposed, by whomever they are proposed, and decide upon the course we want to take.

I want to suggest this to the Senate, and I say it in all frankness; I was authorized to say it in frankness: If the Senate agrees to this motion and the bill is sent to conference with the amendments which will be made necessary by the direction of the Senate, they will be accepted by the House conferees without any question. Whatever they may think about the efficacy or the wisdom of the amendments, I have been authorized to say after conversation with the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations that they will accept the amendments we put on.

Mr. FLETCHER. What amendments?

Mr. JONES. The amendments made necessary under the motion directing the 10 per cent reduction. However we may dispose of that 10 per cent matter, it will be accepted by the House conferees.

Does the Senate desire to act in that way in regard to this important bill? If that action is taken with reference to this bill, as the Senate has already acted with reference to the Interior Department appropriation bill, why should it not so act with reference to subsequent bills? I do not say this in the way of a threat but simply as a fact; but if the Senate applies such a rule to this bill, I shall expect it to apply the same rule to subsequent bills. So we vote on this proposition with our eyes open with reference to that phase of the situation.

I think I am just as economical as any Member of this body. I think I recognize the situation just as clearly as any Member of this body does. I propose to hold appropriations down where I do not think holding them down will do more harm than good, but where I do think that it would do more harm to cut in the way suggested I will oppose such action, unless the Senate directs us to act differently.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to suggest to the Senator that if the House recognizes that the Senate is disposed to reduce every bill 10 per cent all it has to do is to raise every bill 10 per cent, with the idea that the Senate is going to reduce it.

Mr. JONES. They could follow that course. Nevertheless they will do with reference to this bill as I have stated.

If we adopt the hard and fast rule with reference to all these measures, the House will act with knowledge of that intention on the part of the Senate, and taking that into account. By the adoption of this motion we would notify the House that they could act as they saw fit, but they would know what was coming and they could take advantage of their knowledge and meet the situation.

I think the wise course for the Senate to pursue is to take this bill up and wherever an item ought to be cut down or cut out, cut it down or cut it out, and let us pass the bill as we think it ought to be passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless it is passed in that way we shall see a deficiency bill come in to cover most of the amounts cut out. That is what is going to happen; I care not what action is taken to-day, if the 10 per cent is taken off, we will find a deficiency bill here before the fiscal year which this appropriation bill covers ends.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate has arrived at what I believe will prove to be a crisis in the legislative program of the present session. In supporting an amendment to reduce these general appropriation bills 10 per cent no one, I presume, proceeds on the theory that the allowance of the amounts estimated for would be reckless extravagance. If we respond to the argument made by the Senator from Washington and accept the conclusions and representations of the heads of the departments as to the amounts required for the services which they represent, we will never be able to reduce the total cost of government.

I wonder whether it is necessary for me at this stage of the proceedings to enter into a prolonged argument to enforce that conclusion in the minds of other Senators.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I know the Senator did not intend to misrepresent my attitude, but I do not take the position that we must take the items as they are recommended by the departments. We have not done that in making our recommendations. We consider them, however, and reduce wherever we think reductions should be made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator correctly states that he did not say that the representations of the heads of departments were absolutely conclusive, but I recall that a material part of his time was consumed in trying to convince the Senate that the departments know what their departments need much better than Senators can know.

Mr. President, it is just exactly acquiescence in that principle which has led this Government to a position where we are required to reverse our attitude. If we go on pursuing that course we will find that over a definite period of years instead of the Government growing smaller and less expensive it will be growing larger and more expensive. That is a natural process, one that is not to be condemned in all of its details.

We are confronted with this situation. We have a Government which costs $4,000,000,000 a year, at a time when our revenues are scarcely $2,000,000,000 a year. From limit to limit of this country the cry is resounding, "Reduce your costs. Do not increase taxes."

In my judgment, we can not restore a proper proportion between revenues and Government expenses without resorting to both plans, reducing expenses and increasing revenues.

Revenues from income taxes have diminished alarmingly during the period of the present depression. The amount of revenue received from income taxes up to the present date compared with last year is only approximately one-half, and that ratio is likely to be continued throughout the fiscal year. We are confronted with a practical proposition. If we rely on the judgment of the departments we will make only a few small reductions and they will amount to very little when it comes to solving our great problem.

The Senator from Washington made an appeal on the ground that the House of Representatives had cut the bill to the very bone and that the House is just as much interested in economy as the Senate can be. That is true. The House did perform a very valuable service. It reduced the estimates in many items. But still the bill carries an amazingly large aggregate. At a time when the Treasury is almost bankrupt we are proposing to appropriate more than twice the amount that was appropriated for the Department of Commerce in the year 1925. Think of that! Only seven years have elapsed. In 1925 the aggregate appropriation for the Department of Commerce was $24,000,000 plus. It is now very near $55,000,000.

What is the object of the Department of Commerce? I think I need not enter into that in detail, but surely, when we analyze the results that have come from its efforts, rapid increase is not justified. Our foreign commerce is diminishing. It may be and doubtless is true that it would be still less than it is if it were not for the activities of the Department of Commerce. I raise no question about that. But I wonder if we are to be committed now to the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce or any other executive officer that the amount estimated for must be appropriated in spite tof the fact that we are having the greatest difficulty in obtaining the revenues necessary to meet the absolutely indispensable expenses of government.

The same thing is true of other departments. It is true in a less degree of the Department of Labor, of the Department of the Interior, of the Department of State.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has pointed out the situation with reference to the Department of Commerce and I agree with him. I also agreed with the proposed reduction in the appropriation for the Department of the Interior. The Department of Commerce apparently can stand a very large reduction. I was just wondering, instead of sending the bill back to the committee with instructions to make a reduction of 10 per cent, whether it would not be better that the Senate first prescribe the reductions to which the departments should be subjected rather than to have the bill go back to the committee and reductions put where they could possibly not be supported.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is an open question. That is one of the questions raised by the Senator from Washington. My experience is, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana, that in efforts to reduce general appropriation bills in the Senate the tendency has been to increase them rather than to decrease them upon the consideration of specific amendments. There is reason for that. It is not as absurd as one would first think, because practically every item in the bill and any amendment that may be offered to an item in the bill has in itself, considered from what I may term the intrinsic standpoint, some element of merit: that is, there may be presented arguments to sustain it. It is just exactly that fact that makes necessary in my judgment the adoption of the policy involved in the amendment. After all, it is the Budget policy. It says, "You have so much money that you can expend for the purposes of this particular department. Now tell us how that may best be distributed."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not true that exactly what happens is that about six or eight months before the bill comes to Congress the President says to each department, "You may have so much money. Divide it as you deem best"? Then what the Senate is asked to do, and I join with the Senator from Arkansas in the hope that it will do it, is to say to the Appropriation Committee, "That was too much. Cut it 10 per cent. Consult with the Budget and the department as to the best way the cut may be made."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement of the Senator from Connecticut is correct with this single exception. I do not understand that the President in the beginning says to the head of a department, "You can have $200,000,000 or $400,000,000 or $1,000,000." The directions which he actually gives, as I am informed, are, "You must reduce your estimates as much as you can without interfering with the efficient administration of your department." Upon that direction the Cabinet member who is the head of the departments directs that the estimates be made up. As stated by the Senator from Connecticut, that is all right in a time of prosperity; that is all right when revenues are abundant, as they have been until the last year or two. But it certainly is not a policy that can be strictly adhered to in a time like the present.

We know that no matter how the tax problem confronting the present session of Congress is finally resolved, we know that no matter whether a general sales tax is levied or a luxury sales tax is levied and other sources of revenue provided for, there will still be an enormous deficit in the Treasury which can be covered only by the exercise of the power to borrow, and in every case where we issue bonds there should be provision for the payment of interest and sinking fund. So that it is not a question which arises in normal times. I think the Government has been growing too fast, even though the times have been prosperous up until the recent years.

It is a question of whether we wish to take hold of this matter and determine it decisively and emphatically. Does anyone doubt that if a reduction of 10 per cent is made—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Before the Senator leaves the question of the Department of Commerce may I say that we have had considerable experience with the Department of Commerce through the port of New Orleans. We have had to maintain agents in all of the principal centers of foreign countries where we were doing business. We have received practically no benefit, so far as we can ascertain, from the Department of Commerce. I do not know of any other port that has been receiving any particular benefit through the Department of Commerce. Certainly the result at our port has been that since 1925 our foreign commerce has shown no increase, but I would think rather a decrease. I see no reason for the Department of Commerce being operated on revenues in double the amount they received in 1925. For that reason I have been hopeful that before the bill left the floor of the Senate, such aggravated items as that relating to the Department of Commerce would be slashed to such an extent as to bring them down to the amount with which they could probably more effectively and more efficiently operate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I think there is a $300,000 cut in the very item which the Senator from Louisiana mentions. I would like to say that the experience of my State is that the foreign agents have been of extreme value to the merchants and manufacturers of New York, so no matter what item comes up we find that one section of the country will be aligned against another as to its beneficial results. But in that particular item there has been a cut, if I remember correctly, of about $300,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think there is this justification for the reduction of the appropriations for the Department of Commerce. In spite of all the activities to stimulate foreign commerce, which is presumed to be one of the primary functions of the Department of Commerce, we find now that our foreign commerce is constantly shrinking and that in spite of everything that has been done, in spite of this enormous expenditure to promote commerce, we are still losing commerce all the time. It may be entirely true that the Department of Commerce is not responsible for that result, but it certainly is true that it has not been efficient enough to overcome whatever causes have resulted in the reduction of our foreign commerce.

Now, Mr. President-

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. It seems to me one of the great mistakes made by the administration was the failure of the President last June, when there was a world gathering here of chambers of commerce, to take advantage of the gathering to discuss these matters of economic interest. We have world conditions involved in the depression of trade everywhere, and in our country particularly, but when there was an opportunity for a practical consideration of the problem there was a complete failure on the part of the administration to take advantage of it.

In regard to the particular matter referred to by the Senator from Louisiana, I would still think there is very important work to be done through the foreign agents of the Department of Commerce in the development of American commerce.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I do not believe the Senator is really aware of what actually happens at his own port of New York. As a matter of fact, long before the depression came, as I believe the statistics will show, because I have had occasion to investigate them, we were losing traffic at the port of New Orleans, losing it at about the rate the activities of the department were increasing. There has not been any practical result from the activities of the department that we have been able to find. Out of New Orleans our foreign business is as widely scattered as from any port in the world. I do not think there is any reason in the world now, particularly with the Department of Commerce showing no results in securing any trade, so far as we have been able to find, why the department should not be put back upon the basis where it was seven years ago. I believe if we would restrict the activities of the Department of Commerce they might do better, because in instances where we have been attempting to develop the commerce with Latin America which we were enjoying seven years ago we know that the activities of the department have restricted rather than helped us. Fewer agents of the department in foreign countries would be more helpful than more agents.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. However that may be, one fact stands out indisputably, and that is that during this period when the Department of Commerce has been growing and expanding so rapidly our commerce for at least a considerable part of that time has been diminishing and has been shrinking.

The rule of rapid increase applies to nearly all the departments. The legislative establishment in 1925 cost $16,-648,000; in 1932—and the figures I am using are all for that year—the legislative establishment required $27,832,000, or approximately twice as much as in 1925. I do not think anyone here will contend that the Department of Commerce is worth more than twice as much to this Government now as it was in 1925, or that the legislative department is worth twice as much as it was in 1925.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from

Mr. BINGHAM. May I remind the Senator—I am in entire sympathy with him—that the Department of Commerce since those years has been given a number of other activities that it did not have before such as the Census Bureau, the Bureau of Mines, and the Patent Office. They have swollen its appropriations beyond what would be a fair ratio of increase.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is a fair statement, and I thank the Senator for injecting it at this point, because it might have been omitted but for his interruption.

The appropriations for independent offices have increased from $411,000,000 plus in 1925 to $1,383,000,000 plus in 1932. That is more than three times as much within seven years.

The Department of Agriculture cost the Government $74,000,000 plus in 1925, and in 1932 it cost $422,000,000 plus. Here also I should say that certain special activities were required of the Department of Agriculture, which contributed in part to that increase.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas permit another interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the Senator from Arkansas mentioned the fact that the appropriation for the independent offices had increased more than three times.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. Did the Senator also state the fact that that increase was almost entirely due to the Veterans' Administration?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not sure what proportion of it is due to the Veterans' Administration. What I am pointing out is that appropriations for general governmental purposes have grown from a total of $3,748,000,000 in 1925 to $5,178,000,000 in 1932.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator the figures before him relative to the appropriations made for the Post Office Department?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have before me the figures showing the appropriations for the Post Office Department and the Postal Service payable from postal revenues. The appropriation for that purpose was $629,000,000 plus in 1925, and it was $844,000,000 plus in 1932.

Mr. FESS. Those figures show that the increase of appropriations in the case of the Post Office Department is not nearly so great as in the case of the other departments. While I agree that the growth in appropriations for the departments is almost exorbitant, I am wondering how much in the meantime the business of the country has grown. The expenditures for the Post Office Department would furnish a good barometer by which to make a comparison; but the figures quoted by the Senator from Arkansas show that the increase of appropriations for the Post Office Department has only been from about $600,000,000 plus in 1925 to $800,000,000 in 1932.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The figures quoted represent the cost of operating the Post Office Department.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator before him the figures showing the receipts of the Post Office Department?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The revenues from the Post Office Department are not given on the table I am

Mr. FESS. The increase in the revenues of the Post Office Department would be about in the same proportion as the increase in the appropriations for its support.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is fair to say that the State Department has not shown the expansion and increase of appropriations that have marked other departments. In 1925 its cost was $15,000,000 plus, and in 1932 it was $18,000,000 plus. I am omitting the thousands for convenience's sake.

What has just been said of the State Department is likewise true of the Treasury Department. In 1925 the appropriation for the Treasury Department was $269,000,000 plus, and in 1932 it was $278,000,000 plus.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas will remember that nearly $100,000,000 has been taken away from the Treasury for the enforcement of the prohibition act and has been given to the Department of Justice. I am not sure as to the figure; the amount may be less.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would be nothing like that amount.

Mr. BINGHAM. I find it is about $30,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is about $30,000,000. That, of course, accounts for some part of the discrepancy; but, on the whole, the department has been growing, the Government has been expanding, and the cost of government has been increasing.

We are now at a time when we can not afford a $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000 annual National Government; we must reduce our expenses; for, no matter in what form we seek to obtain the taxes which are necessary to overcome the deficit, we are going to encounter very great difficulty; and we have not solved that problem by any means.

I think it will cause difficulty, it will occasion annoyance, to make a reduction as much as is contemplated by this amendment, but we can not avoid it, and if we simply rely on amendments to be agreed to in the Senate, without regard to the total amount of the bill, we shall have what actually happened in the committee occurring in the Senate. The committee commends the House for reducing the estimates and then reports a bill that increases the appropriations over those provided by the House by $1,017,000 plus. No criticism is offered of the committee for that, but efforts to reduce by separate amendments is a process that is ineffective. It is the same process that is suggested to be pursued here. If we leave this open to the proposition that individual amendments shall be added to the committee amendments, this bill will go back to the House probably with several million dollars added, just as was the case in the agricultural appropriation bill and in the Interior Department appropriation bill, although the latter bill has not gone back to the House but has been recommitted to the

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought the Senator was nearly through, but since he has been so kind as to yield to me, may I not give this additional information which came to me only a day or two ago?

I asked the Treasury Department what the receipts and expenditures had been for the 12 months previous to March 1, 1932. The Senator will realize that that includes all receipts of income taxes, the first quarter of which were paid March 15, 1931. The period includes a part of two fiscal years and the figures show how we have been running behind; they show how far the country has been going back and the small likelihood of our being able to raise much more from income and other taxes. The figures as given me by the Treasury Department are these: That during the period from March 1, 1931, to March 1, 1932, the Government received from all sources $2,629,557,267, and the Government spent $5,000,161,594—just about 2 to 1.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Approximately 2 to 1. There is nothing in present conditions to indicate an increase in revenues from existing sources which are now being tapped within the next few months, and circumstances do not seem to me to justify the belief that business will be so revived within the early future as to assure that a part of the deficit will be overcome without additional taxes. The figures the Senator has given are believed to be accurate, and they illustrate the point that is attempted to be made.

Now, what solution have we for this very great problem? We may raise income taxes to any figure that has been proposed and the additional amount of revenue that will be received from them will be comparatively unimportant. We may impose certain taxes on so-called luxuries and the aggregate amount will be inadequate.

The problem is to cut expenses in every way possible. I have not the slightest doubt that there will be less suffering, less annoyance resulting from the reduction proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, than there will be to the taxpayers of this Nation when we attempt to levy such an amount as must be levied. It is not a mere question of being "nice" to people or doing what we would like to do; it is a question of doing something substantial and decisive.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator, if it will not interrupt the thread of his argument?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The habit of leaving to the Budget Bureau, and throwing upon the President the necessity for economy, is an exact reversal of what ought to be done by the legislative branch of the Government. The Congress alone has the power to appropriate, and if the Congress does not exercise that power the Budget Bureau and the Executive himself are not likely to come to the Congress and ask for the elimination of any needless expenditure of money or for the elimination of any needless bureau or board or commission or other agency of government; but when and if the Congress exercises its primary duty and obligation to place a definite and distinct limitation upon all appropriations made for any department of the Government, then we may hope that there will be some actual progress made toward economy in government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Georgia is entirely correct, and his suggestion has prompted this additional thought: Those of us who have been in Congress for a great many years realize that there is a measure of competition between or among the departments in their efforts to secure appropriations. The head of the department who can do best for his organization, who can secure the largest amount of money and the most liberal authorizations for salaries is usually quite popular with his department; and, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia, this system does not make for the promotion of rigid economy, such economy as is necessary to be practiced at this time.

Mr. President, the Senator from Washington made a statement intended to prevent the Senate from agreeing to the pending motion, and that was that if we adopt the motion the House will accept it. Mr. President, that is to me very gratifying information, and for that reason, as well as for the others that I have attempted to assign, I shall support the motion.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do.

Mr. GLASS. Before the Senator from Arkansas takes his seat I should like to inquire if he happens to know what is the relative increase in the cost of government for this fiscal year and the receipts of revenue by the Government as contrasted with, say, 1914—the year before the war?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have not compiled those figures. I think, however, they could be easily obtained.

Mr. GLASS. It would be very interesting to know what the contrast is; whether in the matter of expenditures we have far exceeded the percentage of increase in the revenues of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no doubt of the fact that the revenues are diminishing now; and that is one of the circumstances that make absolutely necessary a diminution in expenditures. As compared with the period of 1914, I have not the figures.

Mr. GLASS. I would undertake to say, from my personal observation, that the Government is not more efficiently administered now than it was 16 years ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield; although I should like to proceed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will read these figures:

On page 184 of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1930, it appears that there was appropriated for the Department of Commerce, for the fiscal year 1919, the sum of $15,000,000 plus. The next year it went up to $30,000,000. In 1921 it was reduced to $23,000,000 plus; in 1922, $17,000,000; in 1923, $20,000,000; in 1924, $22,000,000. Since that time it has more than doubled; and to-day the amount recommended is $54,000,000 plus.

Mr. GLASS. My inquiry was not directed to any particular department of the Government, but to the total receipts and total expenditures of 1914, as contrasted with the total receipts and the total expenditures now. It would be interesting to know, if the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate can furnish the information, just what is the relative percentage of increase in revenues and expenditures for those two periods.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the report, Mr. President; but I can send and get it in just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have sent for the figures and will put them into the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas subsequently said:

Mr. President, a few moments ago, about the time when my remarks were being concluded, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] made an inquiry about the comparison of appropriations and revenues in the year 1914. The following figures have been handed to me. I have not had the opportunity of confirming them myself, but I believe them to be correct.

In 1914 the aggregate appropriations of government were $1,098,000,000 plus, and in 1914 the revenues were $1,018,-000,000 plus, slightly less than the total amount of appropriations, but the difference was not sufficient to occasion any difficulty.

We have gone from a little over a billion dollars in 1914 to $5,000,000,000 in 1932, in round figures, in our appropriations. The revenues have been falling off very rapidly and now equal less than half the amount of our expenditures, taking the figures furnished by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to proceed briefly, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I listened to the persuasive reasons submitted by the very able and always conscientious chairman of the Appropriations Committee why this motion should not prevail. I think there is an unanswerable preponderance of reason why it should prevail, and I rise in sympathy with the views just expressed by the distinguished minority leader.

It is perfectly true that the Senate is to be indicted for supreme inconsistency in connection with its action in relation to the Interior Department bill through the adoption of the horizontal 10 per cent reduction formula submitted by the Senator from Tennessee. Perhaps it is the final inconsistency that I am in favor of the same 10 per cent reduction formula in the pending bill, in spite of these other inconsistencies; but the situation, taken in all its implications, drives me to the inevitable conclusion that this is the only avenue of practical and substantial economic hope.

The Senate was inconsistent in first voting added appropriations into the bill and then ordering the Appropriations Committee to take out the appropriations which we had put in and 10 per cent more. That was inconsistent. It was a species of fiscal piety which might be termed thundering in the index. We certainly were inconsistent when we declined the amendment of the House providing for a practically painless reduction in Federal personnel and the expense involved in it. We were decidedly inconsistent when we declined the House plan and failed to offer any of our own. But that was not the worst of the inconsistency, Mr. President. The worst of the inconsistency was that a perverse majority of the Senate, on a roll call, declined to add to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee the formula which I offered and which could have produced a swift and practical reorganization of a large part of this bureaucratic structure which is substantially responsible for the burdensome difficulties in which we find ourselves. But, in spite of all those inconsistencies, I agree absolutely with the Senator from Arkansas in the propositions which he submits, that, all other recourses obviously having failed, we must take the only one left, which is a major operation. I have faith in it and its promise of ultimate fiscal convalescence.

What is calculated to result, Mr. President—and this is the thoroughly practical reason why I think this motion might well prevail—what is calculated to be the lengthened shadow of this action, if we continue to order these 10 per cent reductions?

If, arbitrarily, the Congress does require a 10 per cent setback in this organization structure of the Government, I think we ourselves will be driven within the next few weeks either to adopt the resolution submitted by the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], which permits executive latitude for the reorganization of the executive structure, and which has been reflected in my own motions and amendments, or we will be driven to propose these reorganizations ourselves. In a word, the Senate will come to a point where essential reorganization no longer can be disingenuously evaded or avoided.

Any Member of Congress who is upon the fundamental trail of Federal economies is interested fundamentally in a reorganization of this structure. It can be reorganized by act of Congress if Congress is willing. Occasionally—very occasionally—Congress is willing; and I should like to submit to the Senate the monitory and significant result which has come from the one reorganization act which Congress did have the courage and the vision to order.

On July 3, 1930, Congress did order a redistribution of all the various functions dealing with veterans' affairs and combined them under one concentrated management. This management went into the capable hands of General Hines, one of the ablest administrators who ever served the Government. As a result of that concentration, the following economies already have been effected:

In personnel, $5,900,000.

In the better coordination and use of homes and hospitals in lieu of new units, $1,200,000.

In economies effected through combination of field activities. $1.200.000.

Through the acquirement of increased facilities through internal rearrangement rather than through new construction. $2,400,000.

And another item of $750,000; a total, without going into further detail, of nearly $12,000,000—and the operation has only started. There is the proof of what can be done by the reorganization which I have been begging the Senate to precipitate throughout this enormous Federal institution.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that the expense of this particular operation of Government under other and diverse auspices would have multiplied tremendously in view of the new duties that have been loaded upon the Veterans' Bureau during the last year or two, having particular reference to the new Spanish War pension claims, having particular reference to the 715,000 new disability-allowance claims in connection with the World War, and having particular reference to the loans upon 1,378,000 adjusted-compensation certificates. The expense would have gone skyward if it had not been for this new, reorganized, and concentrated administration of these veterans' affairs.

Why did not the expense multiply? Why is it that upon this day the net immediate savings in the appropriations for the administration since consolidation are represented by $2,500,000, the estimate of the amount of money which will be returned to the Treasury—there is a novelty—returned to the Treasury from administrative appropriations at the expiration of the fiscal year, not including $1,300,000 remaining unexpended—there is another novelty—in the appropriation made for the administration of the loan provisions of the adjusted compensation act? He who runs may read. Let the lesson be read by the Senate in the light of our contemporary challenge. Ten executive departments! Forty independent establishments! Two hundred bureaus, boards, and commissions! Five hundred and fifty thousand employees! And a deficit of $2,000,000,000 which must be conquered! There is the challenge. Yet thus far the Senate has defeated every motion I have made to provide for swiftest possible readjustments and redistributions and consolidations which would curtail the appetite of our Frankenstein. Mr. President, we can not much longer dodge these realities.

Mr. President, anybody who says that the expense of operating the bureaucracy of our Government can not be cut 10 per cent must deny the implication of this perfectly obvious exhibit; and the implication is that any time we are ready to lay the ax to the root of the tree—if I may refer to the simile which was brought to us by the lyric Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis] the other day—if we are ready to lay the ax to the root of the tree, instead of merely pruning its foliage, it is perfectly obvious that we can accomplish the result to which the Senator from Tennessee addresses his amendment.

Congress can do it if it is willing to address itself to this problem of reorganization. I should prefer that Congress do it. The trouble is that Congress will not do it, as has been demonstrated time and time again. The best possible demonstration of this fact is the pathetic history of what happened to the tremendous report of the joint committee on reorganization which was raised in 1920, which consisted of some of the ablest men in Congress, including the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], which worked three and a half faithful years, which concluded its public hearings in April, 1924, and submitted a formal report on June 3, 1924. Since then it has not been heard of. We shall soon celebrate the eighth anniversary of its obsequies. Why has it not been heard of? It is quite obvious why it has not been heard of. It has not been heard of for the same reason that a reorganization plan can not be put through Congress to-day. It was too good a plan. It crushed too many toes. It defied bureaucracy. It died aborning.

Just contemplate, Mr. President, the invaluable recommendations submitted to Congress as a result of this four years of constructive and effectual labor on the part of the servants of the Congress. Here is a complete scheme of reorganization submitted by this joint committee. Here are the detailed charts. I venture the assertion that if this complete scheme of reorganization were in vogue at this moment there would be no trouble whatever about saving even more than the 10 per cent to which the Senator from Tennessee addresses himself.

Yet the inconsistency of the situation is that although there is not a single pending plan in the Senate for a senatorial reorganization of bureaus the Senate has voted upon roll call to decline the only other available recourse to accomplish that result, to wit, to permit the Executive sufficient executive latitude to do it upon his own responsibility and within his own exercise of power.

Mr. President, the point I am submitting in behalf of the 10 per cent proposal which comes again from the Senator from Tennessee is this. I am persuaded that if we force a contraction in the available funds for the operation of these departments, one of two things is bound to happen: Either the departments themselves will find that it is possible to live within the curtailed income, or the Senate will have to reverse its action on my various motions and pass the reorganization resolution submitted by the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. George] now waiting on the calendar for the Senate's attention.

That is the reason why it is useful, in my judgment, to take this arbitrary, otherwise unscientific, and normally utterly indefensible method of attacking the expenditures which are throttling the country. The sequence of events will force us to implement our economies in order that they may become real.

Figures have been submitted here to indicate what the extent of the tax burden is. I think the most striking figure I have seen is that submitted by the Industrial Conference Board of New York about a week ago. It showed that the total expense of all types of government in the United States, meaning local, State, and Federal, in 1929 was $13,000,000,000,000, or $40,000,000 every week day of the year. I understand it is now $14,000,000,000. Mark you, the cost of government equals in the United States the total cash products of all the motor factories, all the factories making motor bodies and parts, all the iron and steel blast furnaces, all the rolling mills, all the slaughter and meat packing, all the industry engaged in men's and women's clothing. That total volume of cash production out of the commerce of the United States is to-day the tax burden upon the American people, and it is no wonder they are in revolt.

Our share of that burden is 30.1 per cent of the total, or about $12,000,000 every week day that rolls by. That is the share which is within our control. That share will never be appreciably reduced if we continue the normal process of attempting to reduce it either by amendment in committee or amendment on the floor. The sterility of such methods is now obvious. We are much happier economists in the abstract than in the concrete.

Mr. President, we all render vocal allegiance to the pursuit of economy. The question is, Are we going actually to practice what we preach?

We first have to stop all new expenditures, no matter how nobly meditated. At this point may I say that if there are any inconsistencies in the record of the Senate upon the score of economy, they are as nothing compared with the inconsistencies in the attitude of the American people themselves toward the Federal Government and its expenditures. Within the last 90 days, when all this urge for economy had been upon us and on the country, I have had requests from organized groups in the State of Michigan demanding that I support a total of over $11,000,000,000 in new appropriations. The people themselves have to learn that we can not spend and save simultaneously. They have to learn that Uncle Sam is not Santa Claus, and until they cooperate with an affirmative economical impulse with those within the Congress who are similarly stimulated we can not hope for economic salvation.

I have said that we must stop all new expenditures. Beyond that what can we do? We can try to reduce appropriations in committee, but it is perfectly obvious that any such effort is necessarily pathetic. That is no reflection upon the committees; it is a reflection of the fact that the committees confront imponderables, and they can not get away from them.

There is no possibility of a successful reduction upon the floor of either the House or the Senate, because most of the reductions which have occurred in the House—and I am not speaking critically—are calculated ultimately to show up in the form of deficiency appropriations. We are dealing with the shadow rather than the substance.

Mr. President, when we finally cut down to the root of the tree, there is just one way we are going to curtail substantially the appropriations upon which we are laboring, and that is through a reorganization of this swollen bureaucracy. Congress can do it, but Congress will not do it, and Congress has not the time in this session to do it, even if it were willing.

The President has asked for authority to do it. He is willing to accept the responsibility. But thus far we have declined to give him the implements. That is the supreme inconsistency, and it is the supreme challenge to the Senate up to date.

I do not intend again to offer the amendment to this bill which has so heartily been rejected by the Senate upon five or six other occasions when I have sought to put essential reorganization power in the hands of the President. But I am saying that in my judgment the result of this otherwise arbitrary 10 per cent order to reduce appropriations will be, in the sequence of inevitable events, to drive the Senate into an ultimate acceptance of some such amendment or of the resolution submitted by the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. George] and approved by a unanimous report of the Finance Committee, to arm the President of the United States with authority to do this job which the earth requires the application of business methods to a critical business perplexity. Economy is something more than a campaign speech. Our slogans must have the implements to make them real. The tax challenge will not down. It must be answered.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I most heartily indorse all the Senator from Michigan has said. He seems to have some hope that the Congress may sooner or later reduce governmental expenses. I doubt whether that hope is justified. It never has been done in the past. Egypt was unable to do it. Persia was unable to do it, Babylon was unable to do it. Greece and Rome were unable to do it, and I do not know that we are any wiser in our generation than their statesmen were.

Mr. President, I do not know much about this problem, and it is difficult to find out anything. The items in the appropriation bills are there, and no one knows whether they are imperatively necessary or whether we could get along without them. So I thought I would go through some of the books issued by the departments and make a few calculations myself, and along the line of what the Senator from Arkansas as well as the Senator from Michigan have said, I want to call attention briefly to a few facts which, to my mind at least, show that it is possible to reduce the appropriations called for by this bill at least by 10 per cent, and, of course, that action should be taken by the committee. The committee is the proper body to consider these matters.

Things are relative. Nearly everything is relative. Everything must be compared with something else before we can ascertain exactly where it should be placed. An appropriation in a prosperous year, when the Government had plenty of money, might be entirely justified, when at another time the same appropriation would be wild extravagance.

I took the year 1921 and made a comparison of the appropriations for that year with those for the year 1930, covering a 10-year period. By the way, I might say it is within that 10-year period that we have had most economy preached. The administration of former President Coolidge and the administration of the President who now occupies that exalted position have preached economy, and the expenses of these particular departments and independent establishments have increased every year.

I have attempted to work out in percentages figures which would show the real increase, because the amounts in dollars and cents are only relative.

Going back to 1921, we find that the income of the Government was $4,921,294,019. In the year 1930 the total income of the Government was $3,483,225,292. That was the total income. Of course a part of that must be allocated to the payment of interest, a part to the payment of pensions and compensation, and things of that kind. A part of it must be allocated to capital investment, as we might call it for want of a better name. But we can not find out what the total expenses of the Government were at that time.

In 1921 the expenses of the Government-that is, the operating cost of the Government-was $1.534,039,419, while in 1930 the cost of governmental operations was $1,274,-850,467. I might say that this apparent decrease is made up wholly by the figures in the expenditures of the Army and Navy, and more.

In 1921 the percentage of the cost of governmental operation to the entire income of the Government was 31.2 per cent. A little less than one-third of the entire income of the Government was paid out as the cost of operating the Government. But when we come to 1930, 10 years later, we find that the percentage of operating expense to the total income of the Government had mounted to 36.6 per cent of the total governmental income, or an increase of about 16 per cent. That I ascertain from the reports of the departments.

Turning for a moment to some of the departments which we have been considering, the Department of Agriculture, for instance. In 1921 the cost of operating the Department of Agriculture was $55,204,902, which included $9,155,873 that had been invested in nitrate plants representing work country so righteously demands. The greatest business on | undertaken for war needs, and, of course, that was an expense which was not ordinary. Deducting that from the expenditures of the Agricultural Department, we find that in 1921 the balance of expenditure was $46,199,029. The cost in 1930 was $79,090,396, an increase in money of $32,991,367, or 71 per cent. In 1921 the percentage of total income of government expended by the Department of Agriculture was a little less than 1 per cent, or, to be more nearly exact, a fraction more than nine-tenths per cent. What I mean by that is that the Department of Agriculture in 1921 expended a little less than 1 per cent of the total income of the Government. In 1931 the percentage of the amount expended to total income was 2.3 per cent, or an increase in percentage of total Government income of 155 per cent.

The Department of Commerce, about which we have been talking this morning, in 1921, which was just after the year in which the census was taken, expended $31,378,169, while in 1930 the total expenditures were $56,869,984, an increase in money of $25,491,815, or a percentage increase of slightly more than 80 per cent.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I find that since 1925 several new activities of the Government have been transferred to the Department of Commerce. For instance, the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, involving an expense of $90,000; aircraft in commerce, $9,079,660. The Bureau of Mines has also been transferred to the Department of Commerce, and its expenditures in 1925 were $1,900,468. The Patent Office has likewise been transferred to the Department of Commerce, and its expenditures in 1925 were $2,808,800. According to the memorandum which I have, the total increase in expenditures in the Department of Commerce has been a little over $6,498,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt that what the Senator from Washington said is true. As I said, I made up these figures myself from the statistics, and I have tried to deduct such items as those to which he has referred. But let me suggest to the Senator from Washington that immediately after 1921, and in 1922, 1923, 1924, and I believe 1925, the expenses of each of the departments went down and down, and then suddenly took a rise, and have been rising ever since.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Senator from Washington said is correct about the additions to the Department of Commerce, but I invite the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that the 58-acre building in which we house the Department of Commerce is not included in the items referred to.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not. That is not an annually recurring expense.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call attention to the fact that several bureaus were transferred to the Department of Commerce, as follows: In 1925 the Patent Office, in 1926 the Bureau of Mines, in 1927 the Aeronautics Branch, and in 1930 the Radio Division; so there have been four bureaus added since 1925 to the Department of Commerce. The net increase in the past 13 years in what may be termed the "normal" Department of Commerce has been only $3,294,478. This is a 14 per cent total increase in 13 years.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true; but notwithstanding all of that, the increase in expenditures has been very, very large, and no one anywhere disputes it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Kentucky that the radio agency to which the Senator from Florida referred has been transferred to the Radio Commission. Nevertheless, the Department of Commerce insists doubtless upon maintaining a large number of employees unnecessarily for that purpose. There should not be two heads to the radio activities. There ought to be only one.

With respect to the Patent Office, may I say that a few years ago the Patent Office was self-sustaining, but under the present Commissioner of Patents, and possibly under his predecessor, the costs have been increasing. Only a few years ago we increased the salaries and personnel of the Patent Office materially, and still there is a deficit. The Patent Office, if it were properly run, would show a net revenue instead of a deficit.

Mr. LOGAN. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the net increase in the past 13 years of normal Department of Commerce expenditures, without the addition of the bureaus referred to, has amounted to $3.294,478.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator. In the figures which I have submitted I have tried to eliminate those things which do not truly reflect the normal increases in the various departments.

In 1921 the percentage of total Government income expended by the Department of Commerce was slightly more than 0.6 per cent. In 1930 it was slightly more than 1.6 per cent, or an increase in percentage of total governmental income of 166 per cent.

The Department of the Interior in 1921 expended $25,-993,438. In 1930 its expenditures were $36,527,728, an increase in money of $11,834,290 and a percentage increase of a fraction more than 45 per cent. Nearly all of that increase was absorbed by the Indian Bureau. The Indians have been very well treated in the last few years so far as appropriations would indicate.

In 1921 the percentage of total Government income expended by the Department of the Interior was a little less than 0.5 per cent. In 1930 the percentage of total Government income was a little more than 1 per cent, or a percentage increase of 100 per cent.

In 1921 in the Department of Justice, which we discussed briefly a while ago, the expenditures were $6,610,440. In 1930 the expenditures were $22,473,601, but it should not be overlooked that the prohibition enforcement unit has been transferred to the Department of Justice and that the expenses properly chargeable to that unit were $8,977,000. If we deduct that sum from the total expenditure by the Department of Justice for that year, there is still left $13,496,601, an increase in money of $6,886,168, or a percentage increase of 104 per cent. In 1921 the percentage of total governmental income expended by the Department of Justice was a little more than 0.13 per cent. In 1930 the percentage of total income was 0.39 per cent, or an increase in percentage of 200 per cent.

The Department of State in 1921 expended $8,055,000. In 1930 it expended $13,833,921, an increase in money of $5,828,921, or a percentage increase of 72 per cent. In 1921 the percentage of total Government income expended by the Department of State was a little more than 0.16 per cent. In 1930 it was 0.39 per cent, or a percentage increase of 143 per cent.

The Department of Labor in 1921 expended $7,056,989. In 1930 the expenditure was $11,387,950, an increase in money of $4,331,961, or a percentage increase of slightly more than 60 per cent.

I could not figure out the Treasury Department. There have been so many transfers back and forth that I at least did not figure it out. Nor did I figure out the Army and Navy Departments.

However, I did figure out the "independent establishments." In 1921 the expenditures by independent establishments were $44,435,257. In 1930 the expenditures were $124,891,619, an increase in money of $80,456,362, or an increase in percentage of 180 per cent.

What I have been talking about is governmental expense, the cost of administration. I do not mean to say that the expenditures were unnecessary or that they were unwisely made. If a man has plenty of money in the bank he can buy a good automobile, but if he has no money in the bank and owes everybody, which is the condition of so many people now, he has no right to buy an automobile. He must reduce his expenses. The time has come, it seems to me, when the Committee on Appropriations, either in the House or the Senate, or both—arbitrarily, if necessary, but certainly in any event—should take steps to decrease very materially the cost of governmental departments and independent establishments. I believe it can be done. I know it must be done.

We talk about raising money. I do not know whether we are going to get any money or not in the way of taxation. We know we have not enough with the indicated income so far for next year. It is true that we have a tax bill providing a sales tax and other kinds of taxes under consideration in another branch of the Congress. We can not get anything out of business by increasing income taxes because business has no income. When we go into the question of a sales tax we are entering a trail in the wilderness. We do not know where it will lead or whether we will get anything from it or not. It would be a good idea, it seems to me, for the committee to see if we can not trim this total down somewhat and wait until we find out how much money we will have to spend before we enter upon any such wild orgy of spending. So I very much hope that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee will prevail, and I know the chairman of the Appropriations Committee means what he says when he says the committee will do the very best it can to comply with the request of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to enter my protest against the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, and I desire to give my reasons for my position. I take it for granted that the coordinate legislative body at the other end of the Capitol are just as patriotic and just as zealous for the maintenance of a proper relation between income and expenditures as are we, and that they have adequate machinery for performing the duties which devolve upon them in connection with the preparation of appropriation bills.

They have a committee whose duty it is to examine the facts. The committee is limited in number and perhaps does not reflect the full expert knowledge of other Members of the body who are not members of the committee; but the duty is imposed upon that committee, with such aid as it may get from the various departments and from what I consider a useless appendage to our Government known as the Budget Bureau—and if I had an opportunity to do so, I would vote against its perpetuation—to scrutinize meticulously and carefully the activities of the different departments, commissions, and other governmental agencies, and then to bring in their findings before what may be termed and what I believe is termed in the other body the "Committee of the Whole."

Then each Member of that body has a right, and it is his duty, to examine every item with which he is familiar. I do not think any Member is called upon to scrutinize, except more or less perfunctorily, the items which he himself has not studied and mastered; but there is nothing that comes up in a body of that kind in which some one is not particularly interested and to which some one has not given study; and if he is a proper man to be a Member of that body, or of this body, no selfish interest will sway his judgment. I know that selfish interests do affect judgment sometimes, but they should not. However, the facts are gathered and the other House then passes upon them. The bill goes through that mill and then comes to this body.

Here they go through identically the same process. In the Senate there are only two representatives from each State. and consequently their duty is larger and wider and more comprehensive than that of Members of the House. The bill is here referred to the Appropriations Committee, which has the benefit of the findings of the committee of the other body and the other body itself, together with additional facts which it may ascertain. The committee of the Senate goes over the bill with care. It has some facts with which, perhaps, the other body was not acquainted. After it has gone through the bill with the care that ought to characterize the committee—and I have been here for a long time and I have found that the committees generally discharge their duties carefully and efficiently—then the bill comes to the floor of this body for further consideration and study.

Every department of this Government and every commission which is necessary ought to be adequately taken care of; they constitute the machinery of our organized society. After all this care in both bodies, the bill going through the same process in both places, undergoing elimination, substitution, comparison, and the truth being finally arrived at, why should we, before we consider it, arbitrarily impeach the other body by saying that they were derelict in their duty to the extent of 10 per cent? Why not 20 per cent? Why not 5 per cent? What right have we to say that the other body has fallen short of its duty and that 10 per cent of the total provided by it can be saved without impairing the efficiency of our Government?

I do not feel that I would be true to myself or to my colleagues if I should attempt to shift the responsibility which is on me as a member of the larger committee, namely, the United States Senate, to scrutinize each one of the items in this bill and determine whether or not, in my judgment, the amount is sufficient or whether it is too large or too small or what are the facts, and then to vote accordingly. If the motion were adopted, we would arbitrarily impeach a coordinate body by saying that they have not done their duty to the extent of an arbitrary 10 per cent and then force upon the committee of the Senate the absurd duty of reducing the amount carried by the House bill by such a percentage.

Suppose—and it is reasonable to suppose—that every item included in some of the appropriation bills, if not all of them, has been trimmed just as low as it can be trimmed consistent with the maintenance of efficiency, which governmental activities are we going to cripple beyond the degree of efficiency and which ones are we going to leave efficient?

It has been claimed that we must not cut all the appropriations 10 per cent, but must use discretion. Whose discretion—the discretion of the members of the committee or the discretion of this body upon whom the responsibility lies? Is it proposed when the bill comes back from the committee, carrying the 10 per cent reduction, that the Senate shall go over it section by section to ascertain whether or not, in its judgment, the reduction has been made wisely or unwisely?

In any event when the bill comes back will we have to do what we are required to do now, namely, to see whether or not the committee, in carrying out the arbitrary command, has made the reductions where they rightfully should be made. I submit that not a member of this body would be fulfilling his duty if he did not, after the bill comes back and the 10 per cent reduction has been achieved, satisfy himself whether or not it has been wisely achieved as it relates to the different items in the bill. The adoption of such a motion as that now pending is not going to expedite matters at all. It will not save one penny in the long run.

Why should we not proceed decently and in order, as sensible Members of the United States Senate should proceed, and scrutinize these bills in the light of the report of the committee and the facts that are before us and reduce the appropriations contained according to the judgment of the Senate acting as a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. President, I am not going to vote for the motion. I think, if agreed to, it would be an absurd shifting of responsibility. It is my duty to retrench, but to do so according to my judgment in conjunction with my colleagues and not arbitrarily to throw this burden on the committee that has already done its duty and brought in its findings. I challenge any Senator on this floor to rise up and point out what items ought to be reduced to make the aggregate of 10 per cent. The committee has declared what it thinks is right, and when the House has done its best it seems to me that we should not send the bill back to them with the implication that they have failed in their duty to the extent of 10 per cent and thus impeach by that declaration a coordinate body.

Mr. President, our duty is clear and unmistakable. It is to take this bill and go over it item by item and trim it according to our idea of what is wise and proper with all the light before us, each and every one doing his duty here rather than to recommit it to a committee that has already done its duty.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment providing for additional instructions under the motion to recommit.

On page 38, line 1, of the bill is an appropriation of $11,369,500 for the Bureau of Prohibition. That is an appropriation available for the Department of Justice for enforcing the Volstead Act. Of that amount "not to exceed $370,120 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia."

I desire to offer an amendment to the motion submitted by the Senator from Tennessee to this effect, that the committee is further instructed to strike out on page 38, in lines 1 and 2, the figures and words "$11,369,500, of which amount not to exceed $370,120 may be expended," and insert the figures "$250,000."

Mr. President, the effect of that proposal is to strike out the appropriation for the enforcement of prohibition except the sum of $250,000 to be used by the Department of Justice in the office of the Attorney General in Washington. It is essential to provide the Attorney General some appropriation to carry out the law, in view of the fact that the Congress transferred the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau from the Treasury Department to the Attorney General's department. There are certain matters that require the attention of attorneys and clerks and specialists in connection with the granting of permits, the approval of licenses respecting industrial alcohol, and other essential civil matters of administration. However, we find that there has been set up specifically in the law a large amount for the enforcement of this one specific undertaking.

It is unnecessary to discuss the merits or demerits of prohibition in connection with this proposal. Neither the merits nor the demerits are involved. There is a fundamental principle involved, however. In no other undertaking in which the Government of the United States is engaged is there set up such complete machinery for the enforcement of a specific law as is contained in this bill and in the general law.

The Attorney General's department has appropriations to enforce all other penal laws and has appropriations for the purpose of carrying out all the administrative features of the Department of Justice—features both civil and criminal. This appropriation bill carries, under Title II, for the office of the Attorney General, for his assistants, for the Solicitors of the Treasury, Commerce, and Labor Departments, and the office forces of the Solicitors of the Treasury, Commerce, and Labor Departments, the sum of $1,287,780. That covers the general official administration of all the duties of the Attorney General in the Department of Justice here in the District of Columbia, and a part of those duties, and a part of the services rendered by those in the department, is the enforcement of prohibition.

For the purchase of law books there is $9,000 appropriated. That part of enforcement, whether of the prohibition law or some other law, is provided for.

For the contingent expenses for the Department of Justice the bill carries an appropriation of $93,000. Within that appropriation are sums that go toward the payment of certain services and certain activities on the part of the Attorney General's department in the enforcement of prohibition. It still remains, notwithstanding the effect of the amendment which I have proposed, if it were adopted.

For rent of buildings for the office of the Attorney General, $122,000 is carried by the bill. Those buildings are engaged in part in carrying out activities respecting the enforcement of prohibition.

For printing and binding for the Department of Justice and the courts of the United States there is an appropria-tion of $350,000. That appropriation will take care of all the essential printing and binding necessary for the Department of Justice in the enforcement of prohibition.

Another item of $20,000 for traveling and miscellaneous expenses will in part be used by those who are engaged in the enforcement of prohibition.

We find in the same bill, under the same title, the general provision relating to the detection and prosecution of crime. That includes all crime against the Government of the United States. It provides for the activities of the Department of Justice in the enforcement of law against those who commit crimes against the United States, including violations of the prohibition law. For that purpose there is appropriated $2,826,210.

The appropriation for the examination of judicial officesthat is, the official acts, records, and accounts of marshals, attorneys, clerks of courts, probation officers, and United States commissioners, all of whom have some legal function to perform in the enforcement of prohibition—would remain exactly the same as it is.

In addition to that, there is an appropriation of $239,650 for the salaries and expenses in the Bureau of Prisons. those prisons are incarcerated violators of the prohibition law. So, with respect to that question of enforcement, the law will stand as it is and the violators will continue to be imprisoned, notwithstanding the elimination of the $11,000,-000 appropriation.

So, then, we come to the proposition that the appropriations to which I have made specific reference are designed for the purpose of enforcing all laws, quite regardless of what those laws may be, including the prohibition law.

Mr. President, I maintain that all laws ought to be impartially enforced. I know of no reason why an expensive department such as is the Prohibition Bureau should be set up and given over $11,000,000 for the purpose of enforcing a specific law. It is contrary to the best practices known in all civilization respecting the enforcement of law.

What is there about the prohibition law that requires that there should be set up a specific, special department and millions and millions of dollars appropriated to enforce that law? Is that law any more sacred than is the law against embezzlement of Government funds? Is the prohibition law any more sacred than the law against robbery of the mails? Is the prohibition law any more sacred than any other law on the statute books of the United States?

Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought in these times to go back to the standard, logical, sensible method of enforcing law, but enforce all laws with the same vigor, with the same impartiality. So by striking out this $11,000,000 we will still leave for the Department of Justice $250,000 to carry out the additional obligations that were placed upon that department when the Prohibition Bureau was transferred to that department.

I do not know that it requires that amount. No one knows; but certainly $250,000 is ample to pay the salaries and the services in connection with the civil administration of the prohibition law within the District of Columbia at the office of the Department of Justice.

The marshals, the United States attorneys, the clerks, all of the organized machinery of our courts, are provided for in the general appropriations of the Attorney General's Department-every one of them. They all function in respect to the enforcement of all law. Every means, every part of the machinery, every power of the Government, can be exercised by the Attorney General's Department in the enforcement of prohibition notwithstanding the striking out of this $11,000,000, just as those functions and powers are exercised by the Attorney General in the enforcement of any other law of the United States.

So, Mr. President, as I have outlined in these few remarks, it is not a question of prohibition enforcement any used by solicitors, by attorneys, and by clerks who are | more than it is a question of enforcement of the laws against mail robbery or embezzlement, or interstate commerce in stolen automobiles, and a whole category of criminal laws. They all should be under the same department, enforced in the same manner, and enforced without discrimination, impartially, and with the same zeal as may be exhibited in the enforcement of any law.

There is nothing special about a law that undertakes to determine and regulate the personal customs and habits in which people have engaged and which they have enjoyed for centuries past that demands any different or other or special enforcement than is involved in the enforcement of all other laws. For that reason I think the entire amount, with the exception of the few thousand dollars necessary to carry on the necessary work in the office of the Department of Justice here in Washington, should be stricken out.

Mr. President, that means a saving of over $11,000,000. That is worth while. It can be done without any detriment to the enforcement of law. If it is done, it will be in harmony with the practices in the enforcement of all laws of the Government.

I can not conceive of any reason why there should be a sales tax placed upon food and clothing, the necessities of life of the poor, and $11,000,000 taken from the same poor and put into the hands of detectives and spies to snoop upon their neighbors; put in the hands of spies so that some one might be sent to jail if there should be an opportunity to take a drink, spies who are engaged in the most nefarious undertaking in which any human being can engage. There is nothing laudable or honorable in the life of a spy. In war times, when they are detected, they are taken out at sunrise.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Has it been the Senator's experience that the prohibition-enforcement officers in the various States pick out such institutions as they wish to raid and leave others? In other words, they have quite a selection that appears never to be troubled, except it may be at some stated intervals.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator asks me the question, and I think I can give some testimony upon that proposition. The prohibition agents usually have special clients who are not disturbed. Prohibition agents usually have some particular territory in which they conduct their raids, and other territories are left quite free. There is no question about that. There is no question, Mr. President, but that the enforcement of prohibition has involved the Government and its agents in bribery and in corruption, and the Government of the United States even pays money out of the Public Treasury with which these prohibition agents commit offenses themselves. So it seems strange to me that we should continue to engage in the futitle undertaking of attempting to control the personal habits and desires of men and women. It has not succeeded; it never did succeed in any country in the world. Prohibition has been a failure wherever it has been adopted, and, as I said on the floor of the Senate not long ago, America is the single country in the whole world to-day that has a prohibition law. America, as far as that subject is concerned, as I stated, is still in the Dark Ages.

I hope my amendment will be adopted. Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no intention whatsoever to discuss the legal question. All I want to do is to explain to the Senate just what this amendment is. It is to take out one item of this appropriation bill and strike it out before the bill is recommitted to the committee. I do not think any item, it makes no difference whether it is good, bad, or indifferent, should be taken out, but if we are to recommit the bill, I think the whole matter ought to be recommitted together. When the bill comes back, the Senator will have an opportunity to present his amendment to the Senate, and it will be for the Senate to pass on the amendment at that time. I hope the Senator will take that course.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the item to which reference has been made is the largest single item in the whole bill, Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but I think the committee ought to pass upon that item, just as it ought to pass on every other item in the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. It not only is the largest item in the bill but is almost equal in amount to the amount which would be saved under the 10 per cent reduction proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I, for one, have never voted against any prohibition legislation. I do not consider the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as being on the question of prohibition. I might not entirely agree with his views. However, our experience with the funds which have been distributed in our section of the country has led us to the conviction that they have never been productive of law enforcement.

I have seen flourishing in the city in which I live establishments in which liquor has been dispensed openly and widely. I wrote a letter to the Department of Justice when I was Governor of Louisiana undertaking to ask them if they were going to enforce the prohibition law in New Orleans not to raid the establishment of every man who had a "Huey Long" sign on his front door and leave every other institution going wide open that did not have such a sign. I gave them the names and the places; I designated the spot where the liquor establishments were running in the city of New Orleans as wide open as they ever operated a restaurant; gave them the names, gave them the lots, gave them the addresses, showed them that instead of having undertaken to close down that kind of establishment they had gone up three stories, employed agents to knock on this door and other agents to knock on the other door, to raid some man where it took two and a half hours, with a half a dozen agents, to find him, while leaving others operating upon the streets at the addresses I had given them with no undertaking whatever to enforce the law.

There has been no difference in that practice. I see no good being done by the expenditure of the money that is being appropriated under this special item. I do not think the caliber of men who have been employed to enforce the prohibition law, so far as I have been able to find out anything about them, deserves an appropriation of $11,000,000 on the part of Congress.

If I thought it was interfering with the enforcement of the prohibition law, I would not vote to strike out the item of $11,000,000 from the appropriation bill, but my conviction is that it is not assisting the enforcement of prohibition at all to give them special departments and $11,000,000 for the enforcement of the law in the way in which it has been enforced in the territory with which I have had more or less intimate association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Blaine] to add further instructions to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

Mr. McKellar. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Copeland Costigan Ashurst Bailey Bankhead Couzens Dale Davis Barbour Barkley Bingham Dickinson Dill Black Keyes King Fess Fletcher Blaine Frazier Borah Bratton George Glass Broussard Bulkley Glenn Goldsborough Gore Bulow Byrnes Capper Caraway Harrison Hatfield

Tydings Vandenberg Wagner Walcott Walsh, Mass. Walsh, Mont. Waterman Watson Wheeler

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I hope this motion will not prevail. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I have worked long and hard on this bill and on the other appropriation bills which have come before us. A number more are to come before us, and I wish the Members of the Senate generally knew how hard and earnestly that committee has been working.

The recommitting of the bill will mean contributing to unemployment, and we can not afford to do that to-day. It will mean throwing worthy men and women out of employment and swelling the ranks of the unemployed.

Mr. President, I consider it false economy to do this. I feel that it is a mistake. It will cripple the various branches of the Government which are affected, and it will hold back the return to normal times. It will contribute to a continuation of the distress.

I hope the motion will not prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Mc-Kellar].

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is conceded, I think, by those who favor the motion that the step we propose to take is illogical and that it is anything but efficient. It is argued that it is the only thing left for us to do, that it is the only way we have of reducing the expense of government which we believe ought to be reduced. I am not prepared to say that the argument is not sound, although I have not yet reached the conclusion that we have arrived at the time when such a desperate method of reducing expenditures is necessary.

To make such a reduction without any reason except that we are going to reduce expenses and to confess that we are not able to make reductions along efficient lines as we ought to do, is a confession on the part of the Senate in which I am not willing to participate now. We may come to that time. It may become necessary, but I do not believe we have reached the condition where it is necessary to resort to such illogical and inefficient methods to obtain a reduction.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The figures from the Treasury Department as given here this morning show that our revenue is about $2,600,000,000, or a little bit more, while the appropriations this year will run a little over $5,000,000,000. In other words, our income will be about one-half of our outgo. Does not the Senator think it is time we were looking into that rather serious situation?

Mr. NORRIS. I do. I agree to that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. During the summer, the fall, and the winter I am sure the Senator heard statements frequently made by Congressmen and by Senators and by the press that there ought to be and will be a reduction of at least $500,000,000 from the normal appropriations which we would make in ordinary times of prosperity. With a diminution of 10 per cent upon each appropriation bill it would scarcely reach the amount which I have just stated and which, it seemed to be the consensus of opinion, should be the amount of reduction in the general appropriations.

I am sure the Senator with his fine regard for conservatism in Government expenditures will deplore as much as anyone a deficit. I am sure he will concur in any measure that will tend to prevent a deficit and enable us to maintain the credit of the country. It does seem to me in the light of the facts that the committee—and I am not criticizing them at all—have failed to meet the situation and make the reductions which it seems are inevitable, and that the drastic method is justified, even if it is only a gesture and does only challenge the attention of the committees and the country to the fact that we are in a position which calls for drastic measures, apart from what the Senator has called logical methods of legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; suppose that is all true. Still I do not believe that we are now driven to adopt the desperate and illogical method which the pending motion suggests. We are asked to reduce without reference to what we are to reduce. We are asked to say that the total appropriation carried in the bill must be reduced in the aggregate 10 per cent below what it was as it passed the House. To begin with, has anyone produced any evidence that as it passed the House the amount is not already reduced to the very minimum? I do not know that it has been. I do not believe we have yet had evidence that the appropriations in the bill as it passed the House were too high. I myself think many of them can be reduced very materially and probably more than 10 per cent, but we ought to do it in a logical way and make the reduction where the reduction ought to take

In this bill more than in any other appropriation bill, in my judgment, we can make very large reductions without materially injuring the country; but we ought to make them after due and fair and honest consideration, and not just take a knife and cut off items in the dark, because if we make reductions in that haphazard way, we will evidently do injury many times and in other instances not get the reduction we ought to have.

The bill appropriates money for the Department of Commerce among others. The country lived for 100 years or more and got along fairly well without a Department of Commerce. We could wipe it out of existence to-day and save all the money appropriated for its personnel, from the Secretary of Commerce himself down, and still the country would go along pretty well. I would hate to do that, but I would rather reduce in a way similar to that than to take the knife and blindly cut everything 10 per cent or upon any other such basis.

The Department of State has its representatives all over the world, in hundreds and hundreds of cases with nothing to do but to dress up, go to dinners, wear fine clothes, and attend to social duties. We could get rid of thousands of them without injury, but with real benefit to the country. When the world is in a depression such as it is in now, the United States Government, in my judgment, could well take the lead in saying to the rest of the world, "We are going to cut our Government off from all kinds of social functions,"

It is conceded that in the bill, which the Secretary of State says is already cut to the bone, are appropriations to buy clothes and to furnish entertainment of a social nature having nothing whatever to do with Government anywhere. We can cut out those items, all of them. There ought to be in some cases 100 per cent reduction. There are many such instances in the bill. There is money appropriated in the bill for the State Department which I presume, if undertaken to be spent in the United States, could not legally be spent without a violation of the prohibition law. We could cut out all such items and we ought to cut them out for two reasons—first, because under no circumstances have they any business there; and, in the next place, because under present conditions we must reduce expenses.

But these items are going to be approved. By this motion we are not going to reduce materially these useless and unnecessary expenses. There is more money spent by our officials in living up to the demands of society than there is money spent in the performance of official duties. As a great democratic government we ought to say to all the world, "When people are starving all over our country and the rest of the civilized world, we are going to cut off such expenditures. No taxpayer's money is going to be used to buy clothes, to buy flowers, to buy food for entertainment in high social quarters." It would not be difficult to cut out all such items. It would be possible by a stroke of the pen on the part of the President of the United States to stop it all, and to stop it instantly. But we are appropriating money here for that purpose.

I would like to see the amount carried in the bill "cut to the bone." I think if properly considered, we could reduce it much more than 10 per cent, but there are items in the bill where the appropriations suggested are necessary.

I do not know what may happen in the near future. If the depression keeps on over the world and becomes a permanent thing, the entire world will be in the hands of a receiver, and it will not make any difference then whether we appropriate or not, because we will not have money to appropriate for anything. The hope is, the feeling is, the belief is that this condition is not going to last forever. We all believe that it is only temporary. The world is upside down. It is paying the debts and paying the penalties of a great World War which put everything else in history in the background. We had had nothing like it. We are still in the war in a degree. We are still suffering from the extravagance which is going on in one quarter while there is starvation and poverty in other quarters. We ought to have the wisdom and the ability to go through the bill and cut down the appropriations contained in it. I think some of them should be taken out entirely.

Yesterday there was some discussion of an amendment on page 12 of the bill. I was surprised when I found out what the money really was to be used for. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations. There is nothing on the face of the bill to show just what it is appropriated for. Let me read it:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $200,000.

This was increased by the committee to $300,000. I suppose that is one of the items which the Secretary of State asked to have increased as referred to in his letter to the chairman of the committee. There is nothing wrong about that language as I read it. There is nothing that indicates that the money is to be used for entertainment. But we are told that out of that fund payment is made for entertainment. I do not know to what extent, but to the extent that it is used for that purpose, it ought, in my humble judgment, all to be stricken out. Not one penny should be appropriated for that purpose,

Again, on the same page, I read this item:

For post allowances, as authorized by the act approved February 23, 1931, $50,000.

This appropriation the committee has increased to $100,000. I suppose that is another item as to which the Secretary of State in his letter, a part of which the able chairman of the committee read to the Senate, has advised an increase. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if that is correct?

Mr. JONES. That is correct, but that item is not for entertainment purposes or anything of that kind; it is to meet the varying situations arising by reason of climatic conditions, and so forth, among poorly paid employees.

Mr. NORRIS. This particular item is not for entertainment, but, as the Senator stated on yesterday, and I noted the statement on my copy of the bill, this appropriation is used to pay rent and to buy clothes. If an employee in the Torrid Zone is sent up somewhere near the North Pole to carry on his official duties, the Government buys him a new suit of clothes, a beaver overcoat, and such things as that, and perhaps such commodities as may be slipped into overcoats to help keep one warm in a cold climate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Of course, I appreciate the situation. The purpose of the appropriation may be described in the language the Senator uses, but it is extreme language.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, it is an illustration of what could be

Mr. JONES. That is true; but it is rather ridiculous to think that it would be done.

Mr. NORRIS. It is ridiculous to me to think that such a provision is in the bill at all. At the bottom of the same page I find this provision:

For representation allowances, as authorized by the act approved February 23, 1931, $25,000.

The Senate committee again, I presume, under the advice of the Secretary of State, have increased the appropriation to $100,000. That item looks innocent on its face. As I remember the statement of the chairman of the committee yesterday, out of that appropriation some new clothes are bought.

Mr. JONES. No, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. What is bought out of that appropriation? Mr. JONES. Not new clothes; but something worse.

Mr. NORRIS. I will bet my last penny that secondhand clothing will not be bought.

Mr. JONES. Something even worse than that.

Mr. NORRIS. Something is bought to carry in the clothes to put inside the men later on. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, why not obliterate that appropriation entirely? It is an innocent-looking item on its face, but I presume there is enough whisky in that $100,000 to provide for the whole Diplomatic Corps and make every one of them drunk. [Laughter.]

That is extravagance, in my judgment; but if we cut it down 10 per cent, we would take off but $10,000 and still have enough left to get more men drunk than there probably are in any one branch of the Diplomatic Corps.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If this bill goes back to the committee under the motion I have made, it will be in the province of the committee to cut out that item entirely.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. And, by the way, I want to say that I agree with the Senator about this entertainment item. I think at this time, when our Government is pressed as it is, we ought to cut out entirely appropriations for entertainments, and I hope to have the pleasure of voting to do so when the bill goes back to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, evidently the influence of the Secretary of State is great with the committee. I confess, when I listened to the argument made here in favor of the pending motion, I felt, in desperation almost, as though I ought to vote for it; but I voted against the other similar motion, and this one seems to me to be so illogical; it may not result in making reductions that are even desirable, in my judgment, and it proposes to make reductions without reference to merit that I can not bring myself now to the idea of voting for it. We may have to cut out many items if the hard times continue longer than we think they will—and they may—that we now regard as necessary.

As I have said, the Department of State has its representatives all over the civilized world, giving entertainments to foreigners to talk to whom they have to have an interpreter, and in the same localities are representatives of the Department of Commerce. It may be they do some good; I am inclined to think they do; but it seems to me now that we ought to get along without the services of thousands of them in order that we may economize.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. It is unnecessary, I know, for me to suggest to the Senator that many of these items could be cut out entirely by the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, and I will say to the Senator I think we ought to cut them out.

Mr. JONES. I would heartily vote that way as to many of them.

Mr. NORRIS. We ought to cut out every one of those mentioned. We can do so with less injury than we can cut out many other appropriations. For instance, while we do not appropriate directly for common schools, we would exceedingly dislike to cut down governmental expenditures so that we would have to close our public schools. I can conceive of a condition where we might have to do that, but I do not believe we have reached that point as yet.

I do not believe that we ought to get so scared over the fact that we have a deficit, even though we have to borrow money temporarily in order to tide us over a bad condition. It is a serious question whether that is not better business than to destroy some of our institutions that are necessary for the education of our children and for the welfare of our people generally. Although it is not in this bill, I should dislike to cut out, for instance, all appropriations for the Public Health Service. I would not want to cut out all appropriations for the War Department and the Navy Department, although I think we can well afford to reduce them very much. I would not want to obliterate the State Department, and while I can not say, because of a lack of intimate knowledge just how much we could reduce its appropriations, I do know that the provisions of the bill for State Department activities are filled with what seem to me not only unnecessary but harmful appropriations.

We ought to say to the world, "We are going out of the society business, we are going to stay in the government business, and we are not going to permit our representatives abroad to devote fortunes, whether their fortunes or the fortune of the Government, to the expensive luxury of giving dinners and other social entertainments which cost millions and millions of dollars, particularly when our people at home and people abroad are suffering for the very necessaries of life."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I wonder if the Senator has ascertained, from a study of the bill, why the committee cut down the appropriation for the Children's Bureau $100,000 and added $75,000 to the booze item?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not understand why.

Mr. COUZENS. The booze item was raised from $25,000 to $100,000 and the appropriation for the Children's Bureau was cut from $395,005 to $295,500.

Mr. NORRIS. In my judgment, both those changes are mistakes. If I had my way about it, while we may reach a point if we get far enough behind, so that we will have to wipe out the Children's Bureau, it would be one of the last things that I would want to cripple. It is something, I think, that will redound in the end to the honor, to the glory, and to the perpetuity of our Government itself to see that children are properly reared, properly fed, and properly educated, in order that they may be able, when the time comes, to take upon their shoulders the responsibilities of civilization and of government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I simply want to observe, in connection with what the Senator has so well said, that in many places throughout the world consular officers and other representatives of the State Department and the foreign representatives of the Department of Commerce apparently are engaged in much the same work, gathering the same statistics, interviewing the same people, to such a degree, indeed, that there has developed in many places intense rivalry between the various agents of the respective departments of the same Government. Certainly the agencies of the Commerce Department or those of the State Department could cover the field entirely and save that duplication of expense. I merely wanted to make that observation in connection with the Senator's remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his observation; he has told the truth. There is real competition, even, I understand, in foreign lands, between representatives of different departments of the Government. Probably there are instances where neither department ought to be there at all; we could pull out entirely and save all the money thus expended by both departments.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I myself have wondered about these commercial attachés, as they are called. The Department of Commerce has now reached into almost every corner of every country on the globe, and it seems to me, from what I know of their activities, that they are traveling salesmen for private enterprises in this country, going about the world and through the world, maintained by our Government for the benefit of private corporations here. They are what we called in the old days in the country towns "drummers," drumming up business for private interests at the expense of the Federal taxpayers. It is activities such as those which have multiplied so widely and so rapidly which have aroused the feeling of the people of the country against this rapidly growing expansion of the Federal Government. I can not see any real justification for such activities.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just one further word, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me suggest, if the Senator from Nebraska will be good enough to yield, that this rivalry becomes oftentimes so keen as to work positively to the disadvantage of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it does.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. First let me answer the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois, which was very timely. I would not under normal conditions abolish entirely the system to which he has referred. I believe it does some good for our business men, although as a rule it is the large corporations that get the benefit of the market obtained by these "drummers," as the Senator has well named them. In a time like this, however, Mr. President, this is an item where we ought to cut the appropriation. There is not any business now and all the traveling men in the world can not get it. We have put the rest of the world away from us to a great extent by a tariff that is as high as the mountains; the depression has come on and, it seems to me, when it is admitted that we must cut appropriations somewhere, here is a place to cut them, even though we may not want to do so.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, with reference to the conflict between the State Department and the Commerce Department and the Agricultural Department I desire to suggest that in my judgment that complaint in former years was justified. I do not believe it is justified now. For the past three to five years those three departments of the Government have been working out a systematic cooperative program whereby there is not the duplication suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

If we want to curtail the service and do away with the possibility of having trade emissaries in foreign countries, all right; but I do not believe we are going to find that there is as much duplication there as has been suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, why have them there, even if there is not duplication at the present time? They are not getting us any business now, are they?

Mr. DICKINSON. In my judgment, that would curtail what business we are getting over there; and we are holding our share.

Mr. NORRIS. The best way to get some of that business, I think, is to say to the world, "Instead of shutting ourselves in by a tariff wall that runs to the sky, we are going to put our tariff down to a reasonable point and do business with you and enable you to live as well as ourselves."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President-

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In answer to the Sen

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In answer to the Senator from Iowa, I will say that I had not as yet mentioned the Department of Agriculture, and do not think I care to do so, with reference to any duplication of effort, expense, and overhead; but as recently as last summer some of this duplication was going on as between agencies of the Department of Commerce and the Department of State—so much so in various parts of the world that there was the keenest rivalry between the two departments, and in some instances foreign governments have been nonplused to know why there should be this keen competition between different governmental departments of the same country. So, in answer to the Senator's suggestion that that condition might have existed three years ago, I am suggesting to him that it exists now, or it did exist as recently as the past summer.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that it exists to-day; and if you talk confidentially with some of the men in the Department of Commerce and in the Department of State, they will tell you that only a year or two ago the competition was so great that there were even strained relations between the heads of two or three of these departments. I know that to be the case, because I came in contact with them in one way or another, and found that it was there. They were jealous of each other. One wanted the other to take his men out and let him have the territory, and the other would not do it. They came in competition, and the result was rivalry and jealousy.

When a man is in a manufacturing business and has traveling men on the road, when his business all disappears and he has no more customers, it may be bad business to pull his traveling men off temporarily, but I think that is what business men do. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] suggests that he would put on an extra man; but if five men can not get you any business, probably six can not get you any business. Anyway, in these times, when we must cut appropriations somewhere, we ought to say, "If these traveling men in foreign countries are necessary, let their expenses and their salaries be paid by the men who get the benefit of the business, if any, that they bring to those men."

Mr. President, it was developed yesterday, and admitted to-day, that some of these items have no more to do with the official duties of our representatives abroad than the flowers that bloom in the springtime. It is in the minds of some people, some alleged statesmen, that in order to do business with a man you must take him to the theater, you must buy him 50-cent cigars, you must give him something to drink, you must give him a dinner.

The ordinary business man, however, looks with horror upon the traveling man who tries to hoodwink him in that way. While he may accept his invitations to the theater, and to other places of amusement known better outside of the Senate than in it; while he may accept the entertainment, he may smoke the cigars, he may drink the whisky, he realizes that if the man who is trying to get his trade with inducements of that kind makes any money, he must charge enough to get back with a profit everything that he has spent for this unnecessary and useless entertainment. So we ought to say to the world, "We are not going to bribe you to get your friendship, neither are we going to pay for the whisky to get you drunk in order to make you our friends," and they will respect us more in the end than though we pursued a different course.

Why, it is said here—and we have something in this bill for it—that when a man changes his location, and has to have a new suit of clothes, he pays for it out of this appropriation. If he has to buy something to entertain the officials of other governments, he pays for it out of the tax-payers' money; and yet we are crying for reduction of taxes!

Mr. President, it has been only a few weeks since it was publicly announced in the newspapers that Mr. Mellon would not have to buy any knee breeches when he went over to London; that General Dawes had given him his, and that Mr. Mellon was going to use them. It is unnecessary for us to appropriate money to buy clothes for men who accept these posts and spend ten times more than their salaries in entertainments and social functions.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senate itself ought to cut out these appropriations. Instead of increasing from $25,000 to $100,000 this "booze appropriation," as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] so well calls it, let us cut it out entirely. Instead of increasing the fund for new clothes from $50,000 to $100,000, let us cut that out. Instead of increasing the entertainment fund from $200,000 to $300,000, let us cut that out.

The adoption of this motion for a 10 per cent reduction will not accomplish those things. We will find when the bill comes back here that these funds will still be in it, because there is too much influence in society to take them out. After all, society, to a great extent, controls governmental functions, not only in Europe but in the city of Washington as well.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it may be remembered that I spoke briefly on this subject yesterday. I have no desire now to traverse the same ground, and I am sure no Senator would welcome such performance on my part; but I have been challenged by good friends personally, politically, and parliamentarily, and have been told that the only way we can ever secure a reduction is by a flat 10 per cent on each bill.

I am reminded that when the responsible authorities many years ago concluded to build the Siberian transcontinental railway, and the engineers laid before the then Czar the blue print and said, "Your Majesty, will you kindly indicate the general route that you would like to have this great railroad take from St. Petersburg to Vladivostok?" the Czar took a straightedge and a pencil and marked a straight line and said, "That is the way I desire the road to go." "But," they said, "Your Majesty, there are hills, there are mountains, there are grades, there are rivers to be considered." He said, "Well, against my idea rivers and mountains and grades amount to nothing. I want it built in a straight line." Of course, the engineers did not do it. They built a great road, but they could not pursue the line the Czar indicated.

I wish it distinctly understood that I am not cynical with respect to reducing appropriations. I believe that those who are going to hold office in the future in county, State, and Nation will be those who appreciate and try to reduce the heavy load of taxes the American people are bearing. Some Senators see in the distance something of peril to our Republic, some see another peril; but for some years I have seen, not in the distance but in the offing, a gigantic octopus that will ultimately strangle all business in America unless restrained. I refer to excessive taxation in State and Nation. I wish it distinctly to be understood that I am in sympathy with the general result sought to be obtained by the Senator from Tennessee; but I believe that he will not lead us to any position where we can get a practical reduction in governmental expenses.

I have always been proud of the Senate. No matter what traducements and maledictions may be poured upon the United States Senate, there is not a citizen of the United States but would be glad to be here. It is a great office, and it is a great honor to be a Senator of this Republic, but I must admit that the Senate pays itself a poor compliment when it says, forsooth, "We can not take up a great appropriation bill nor make these refined distinctions as to who shall have an appropriation increased or what department should have it reduced." That, to my mind, is a poor compliment to the Senate of the American people—that they are so debilitated in intellect, in information, or in character that they must, forsooth, throw the whole bill back to the committee in order that the committee may act for them

Mr. President, in view of my opposition to the flat reduction of 10 per cent, because I believe it is illogical and will not work true reform, I have been asked to state wherein I think, then, that any appropriations could be reduced.

Only yesterday, on page 12 of the bill, I indicated where I think at least two or three hundred thousand dollars of appropriations might be saved and not made. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations. My colleague [Mr. Hayden] is. Moreover, in addition to his membership on the committee, I have scanned the membership, the personnel. They are Senators of patriotism, of clear judgment. A man who serves on the Appropriations Committee does a heavy duty, and I doubt if he should have any other assignments, because it is real work to serve on the Appropriations Committee. The questions I am now about to ask with respect to items in this bill do not and should not indicate that I am opposed to those that I am going to mention.

I hold before me here the Official Register for the year 1931. Senators, of course, peruse this book frequently, one not more than the other. I will ask them to advert to page 101 of this Official Register.

Under the Department of Commerce we find a large number of commercial attachés listed. They are too numerous for me to attempt to name. But, for example, here is a commercial attaché at Santiago, Chile, at $8,000 a year; one at Paris, France, at $10,000 a year; one at Shanghai, at $10,000 a year; one in Guatemala, at $6,500; one at Montevideo, Uruguay, at $6,000; one at Tokyo—and I will omit the salaries, because they range from four to six thousand dollars a year; Lima, Peru; Cairo, Egypt; Bogota, Colombia; Johannesburg; Buenos Aires; Bucharest; Berlin; Budapest; Rio de Janeiro; and so on through many pages.

I had supposed that our consular officers abroad took care of business for the American Government and our business men, and that our Diplomatic Corps, our envoys, our ministers, our ambassadors took care of all other matters not particularly relating to business. Doubtless the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can give me the reason why we apparently have men at salaries of from $4,000 to $10,000 a year in all the principal cities of Europe.

Mr. President, if one travels in Europe he can scarcely walk about without stumbling over a commercial attaché representing the United States at some $8,000 or $10,000 a year. They may be necessary; I do not know. I can not vote to reduce their salaries 10 per cent, because I do not know. Possibly all of the business we have abroad is due to their activities. I now ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to tell me what service these functionaries perform and when they were first inducted into office; and may we not make some reduction by eliminating some of them here and there?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in the first place, their positions are established by law. It was through legislation which Congress enacted that the positions were created.

Mr. ASHURST. That is just what I wanted to know. I am not too proud to expose my ignorance on the subject. I seek information.

Mr. JONES. I know the Senator's interest, and the reason for his inquiry.

Mr. ASHURST. Are these officials absolutely necessary?

Mr. JONES. They may not be very necessary now-Mr. ASHURST. That is what I thought.

Mr. JONES. Yet they might be next month, or they might be next year. At any rate, we enacted the legislation which created the offices and the positions, and it is not for the Committee on Appropriations to say that these men should not be paid.

Mr. ASHURST. It is for the Senate. Mr. JONES. It is for the Senate; yes. Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. JONES. The Senate would not make a change without some alteration in the law, no doubt.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I think that in times like the present these men are of more importance in securing business for the industries of this country than they are in times when we can sell anything anywhere. They are at their posts virtually as traveling men, as we call them in this country, in order to secure orders for American concerns which manufacture different lines of goods. I can remember the time when we had no trade to speak of in these foreign countries. Our trade there has been built up by the Department of Commerce, and I want to give them honor and credit for it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, here is an illustration of the importance of these appropriations laid before the Senate and the country; and the country has been quite suspicious of these particular items. Make no mistake that our heavily burdened taxpayers look with inquiring eye to see why, in addition to our ambassadors, ministers, envoys, diplomats, and consuls, we have in every important city in the world these commercial attachés. Here is a statement-before the Senate, not in a committee room, but before the Senate-by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who is himself also well posted, vouching for the necessity of these appropriations. Is not that a better plan than to have a committee tell us privately? The Senators from Washington and Utah have performed a public service in informing the Senate and the country as to why these officials are necessary in the various foreign cities.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I will give the Senator a little more testimony. In the House hearings Mr. Oliver inquired of Mr. Klein, who is the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, almost the identical question which has been raised by the Senator from Arizona. He said:

Would you like to discuss briefly the necessity for maintaining a full force in the foreign fields at a time when, of course, there is a falling off of the business?

Doctor Klein said this:

Most certainly, because on the face of it our exports have lost heavily. In value they have lost more than they have in volume. That would indicate with less export trade to handle the Government facilities need not be so extensive; as a matter of fact, you have there again a reversal of the situation as in the domestic position, which I described—that is, more help is being demanded from our facilities. An increasing pressure of competition is coming about. The Europeans are more and more industrious in searching for their markets, and they are pressing our export men. We have got to be more vigilant than we were in the fat years of 1926, 1927, and 1928, when Europe was not so much in position to give us stiff opposition. To-day they are well equipped as to plants and partly because of the heavy American investments abroad; American capital over there has given Germany, England, and Italy a new industrial plant largely, and we are running up against that competition throughout the world. The result is the decision confronts our business men as to whether they must out up a fight, where they may have the aid of the Department of Commerce, or get out of the field.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ari-

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. Testimony was given before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate on this very subject, and I think the Senator from Arizona would like to hear a short statement from a representative from the Department of Commerce on a few of the activities of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. He said:

Last year we returned in this work more than $57,000,000 to American business, which is more than 10 times the total appropriation for our whole bureau. We are a sales group in that sense. We are a working organization, attempting to check what we do in terms of service against results.

It is through the commodity divisions, with the aid of the district and foreign offices, that the department was able to secure for American business $57,000,000 of new foreign sales and savings during the past fiscal year. They serve continuously over 24,000 export firms and 46,000 firms making daily use of the bureau's domestic trade services.

Then he said further:

The demand on our lumber division alone for that purpose has increased 76 per cent since the first of this year. If every individual lumber manufacturer in the country had to send abroad to private connections through his banks or through local chambers of commerce, you would get a fearful duplication of expenditures by private industry everywhere.

Just one other interruption in regard to the Bureau of Mines. Does the Senator mind if I refer to that briefly in his time?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ODDIE. The House cut various items relating to the Bureau of Mines to a very low point, and afterwards, in my opinion, one of the most courageous and manly things was done by a Member of the House, the Representative from the Senator's State, Representative Douglas. He offered the amendments in the House reducing the items under the Bureau of Mines. Then he saw from the figures given him that a mistake had been made and he wrote to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate stating that a mistake had been made and the items were restored in this bill by the Senate committee.

Mr. President, I think that should not pass without some notice. Mr. Douglas is an able engineer, a man of the highest integrity, and he proved it by that act of his.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from Nevada for the contribution he has made, and I am grateful to him for the generous, indeed, the just tribute which he has paid to the Representative in Congress from Arizona, Mr. Douglas. Mr. Douglas needs no word of praise from me, because his services to the American people are valuable beyond the range of eulogy.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the Senator's attention to a statement, which I imagine appears in the hearings. The Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce I think is doing a splendid work. This statement says that $5,334,122 was the appropriation for the present fiscal year, 1931–32, for that bureau. The estimate for 1932–33 was $4,869,531. The decrease in the appropriation for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been $464,591, or 8.7 per cent.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I am now satisfied as to these items, and I have demonstrated to the Senate that when we take these items up seriatim, one after the other, the Senate body is informed. It is not fair to ourselves, it is not fair to the committee, to ask them in a committee room to do all this work, and then inform Senators by word of mouth—not by debate on the floor of the Senate but by word whispered privately here and there—that this item is all right, and this one is not.

We should take up the bill item by item, legislating, in my judgment, in approved, parliamentary, and American fashion, and in the way we ought to legislate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield, of course, to the able Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. If the motion prevails and the bill goes back to the committee with the order to bring it back with a 10 per cent cut, will the Senate be free to make any changes in the bill as reported by the committee, or would this motion be an instruction to the committee only?

Mr. ASHURST. I assume that if the Senate instructs the committee to reduce the bill 10 per cent, the committee will do so; but I do not believe that I would thereby be foreclosed from moving to reduce an item if I wished to, or from moving to increase one if I saw fit to do so. I shall ask the Senator from Tennessee about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator would have the right, and any Senator would have the right, when the bill came back, to suggest amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. Then what is the use of marching the men up the hill and marching them down again? If, when the bill comes back, we find ourselves in the same position where we are to-day, how far have we advanced upon the stream of legislative time? We are just where we began.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield. Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator whether, in view of the fact that all of these department heads, these bureau heads, and Secretaries, can be called before the Committee on Appropriations, and can state how best to reduce these items, and that can not be done in the Senate. is it not better to send the bill back to the committee and have the committee find out from the bureaus where best they may take off the 10 per cent? In other words, we can not call these men in before the Senate. We can not discuss these items with the bureau chiefs in the Senate. We can not discuss them with the Secretaries. Yet the Committee on Appropriations can call in the men and say, "We have instructions to cut the Budget estimate 10 per cent. How do you suggest that we do it to the best advantage?"

Mr. ASHURST. If I had the slightest suspicion that some committee of Congress had not called these bureau chiefs before them, I would vote instantly to send the bill back. I had assumed-and surely it is not a violent assumption-that the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, which by custom if not by the Constitution originates all supply bills, had called representatives of all the various agencies and bureaus before them and had asked these questions. I had assumed that my learned friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, had called the representatives of these agencies of the Government before his committee and had questioned and interrogated them about these appropriations. Surely he has not failed to do that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator whether, if the bill goes back, a new situation will not have arisen? Of course, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the committee have heard from these bureaus. But now comes a new proposal, a proposal to reduce the appropriations by 10 per cent. Does not that create a new situation in which these Secretaries and bureau chiefs ought

Mr. ASHURST. I appreciate the force of the question. and I would cut a poor figure in attempting to discuss fiscal matters with the able Senator from Michigan. I wish to participate in no such exhibition. But I insist that the status quo has not been altered so completely within a few weeks as to change the testimony on the part of the executive branch. I give the executive branch credit for trying in a modest way to be economical at this time, but in 5 cases out of 6, in 5 replies out of 6, the bureaus and departments will say, "We need these appropriations."

Mr. COUZENS. Of course that is true; but, if we have only so much money to spend, is it not desirable to ascertain from those in charge the best way to spend it?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I believe?

Mr. COUZENS. No. Mr. ASHURST. I am assuming, and I have a right to assume, that the Appropriations Committee of the House and the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, either or both, called the department heads and bureau heads before them and have questioned them as to these items. Assuming that the committees have done so, surely the witnesses can not now change their testimony.

Mr. COUZENS. No; I was not suggesting that; but suppose the Senate said the appropriation must be reduced $12,000,000. What is the best way to do it? That can not be done on the floor of the Senate. I believe the committee can do it when they call the bureau chiefs and department heads before them and say, "We have a mandate to reduce this appropriation $12,000,000. How do you suggest we go about it?"

Mr. ASHURST. I want the Senate, rather than the committee, to do that. I would prefer the body of the Senate to cut the appropriation $12,000,000 rather than leave it to the committee to do.

Mr. COUZENS. How can the Senate do it?

Mr. ASHURST. I am not trying to dodge the Senator's question. I am giving the information at my command.

Mr. COUZENS. There must be more or less desirable places where the $12,000,000 can be deducted. It seems to me it is only proper courtesy to the department to consult them as to the best place to deduct it. I confess I do not know. We can not call the Secretaries and bureau chiefs to the floor of the Senate to debate the question with us, but that can be found out by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ASHURST. But I am assuming the Appropriations Committee have already performed that function.

Mr. COUZENS. They have, in so far as this specific bill is concerned; but now the Senate is about to say, apparently, "We think this is at least $12,000,000 too high and we want that amount taken out of the bill somewhere." Where is the best place to take it out?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senate is the best judge of that and not the departments.

Mr. COUZENS. But we can not call the department heads and bureau chiefs to the Senate Chamber and ask them here the best place to take it out of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. That is to say, our attempts at economy depend upon the ipsi dixit of the departments. That is what I object to. I want the appropriations to be granted upon the ipsi dixit of the Congress and not of the departments, with all due deference to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to invite attention to the fact that the Bureau of the Budget had all the department chiefs before them and, after meticulous examination, as we may assume, they made only slight reductions. The President insisted there should be a reduction and they only made a slight reduction. The Senator knows some bureau chiefs came before the House committee, and if he will read the hearings as I have done—and I do not want to be critical—that investigation was merely, "We have now come to this item of $150,000. What have you to say about it?" The witness would make a statement and then they would take up the next item. The Senator will find-and I make no criticism of any committee-that there is no digging down to bedrock in the hearings to which attention has been called. We take the recommendation of the bureau, and, as the Senator knows, when we rely upon the bureau we can never get any reduction.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the reason why I want the body of the Senate instead of the committee to make the reductions

I repeat that I am not oblivious to the necessity for reducing appropriations. I have never been one of those who join in the "anvil chorus" against the former Secretary of the Treasury. I did not agree with him in many things. Some of the things he did I was glad to approve: but to my mind it was strange to see a man with the experience of the former Secretary of the Treasury attempting to retire the national debt at the rapid pace at which he attempted to retire it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. LONG. And to be making the rebates to the large corporate interests that he was making, of course, made it practically impossible to reduce the total expenditures of the Government.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for the suggestion, but I can not go into that because it is a subject on which I have no knowledge, and, as I said in the Senate the other day, I long ago abandoned the idea of talking about a subject upon which I have no information. So, not knowing a thing about the very vital subject which the Senator from Louisiana properly brings up, I again say that we can save, we can retrench, to the amount of $500,000,000 a year by the simple and, I think, the just expedient of departing from the plan of Mr. Mellon, who, for some strange reason, had an obsession that he ought to retire the national debt within 20 or 30 years. If, instead of retiring the national debt at that pace, we should be more moderate and should distribute the national debt along as is done in all well-managed finance organizations in business and in government, and if we may depart from that foolish pseudophilosophy, which so captivated Mr. Mellon, namely, that we ought to retire the national debt within 20 years, we can retrench to the extent of $500,000,000 a year. The Government needs to retrench. The bondholders are pleased that the period of maturity of the bonds shall be extended.

So when the appropriation bill comes before us I do not see where our Committee on Appropriations could make a greater contribution to the public service at this time than to slow up the reckless and relentlessly rapid pace at which the former Secretary Mellon was attempting to retire the national debt.

PROPOSED RESUBMISSION OF EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, there are several Senators and many people in the country who desire, if possible, and by orderly parliamentary methods, to secure a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people and to the legislatures. The Committee on the Judiciary has been very busy with many pieces of important legislation and perhaps it has not had an opportunity to consider the resolution seeking to accomplish a repeal of resubmission, as it were, of the eighteenth amendment.

In order to test out the sentiment of the Senate I have prepared a petition which I have submitted to a number of Senators, asking the Judiciary Committee to report a resolution which would resubmit the question to the Senate and, if approved by the Senate, to the legislatures of the States. I am gratified to report that 24 Senators, representing various parts of the country, have affixed their signatures to that petition. I am also gratified to report that at least a half a dozen more stated that while they do not desire to sign the petition they would be inclined to vote for a resubmission of the question if opportunity were offered them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator read the names of the Senators?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am coming to that in a moment. There are also a number of Senators who, I know, want to sign the petition, but who happen to be absent, namely, for example, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

With all due respect I trust the Committee on the Judiciary will accede to our wishes and report the resolution so we may have an opportunity to vote upon it. Recently a vote was had in another body where the vote was almost even between those opposed and those in favor of the question.

On next Wednesday, March 30, as soon as I may have an opportunity to obtain the floor, it is my intention to move formally that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the resolution. In the meantime I ask that the petition with the names be read in my time and that the petition be left in the custody of the clerk so that Senators who may be temporarily absent may have an opportunity between now and March 30 to sign it if they desire so to do. I ask that the clerk may read the petition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have just entered the Chamber after a temporary absence. I heard the Senator say that he expected, as soon as he could get the floor, to file a formal motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from something.

Mr. TYDINGS. I said I would make that motion on March 30.

Mr. NORRIS. As chairman of the committee I suggest to the Senator that I have no objection to the Senator filing that motion now; and I will agree, if the Senator can get other Senators to agree, to take it up now by unanimous consent. There is nothing before the Judiciary Committee that I want to see held back. I will say to the Senator that I think the resolutions which he introduced—and he will agree to what I say, I know-were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and immediately upon his request I appointed a subcommittee, and that subcommittee has been working upon the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I think the Senator is more than fair in what he just said. As I said, perhaps before the Senator came into the Chamber, this motion is intended as no reflection upon the committee which has been occupied with very important legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not take it as a reflection at all. The Senator has a right to make the motion and when he makes it all I will do on the part of the Judiciary Committee will be to state the facts as to just what we have been doing and what we have been trying to do, and leave it to the Senate. If they want to take it out of our hands and bring it to the floor of the Senate, I shall have no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. In just a moment. I would like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I would prefer to make the motion on March 30 for the reason that many Senators may desire to vote on the motion, and if we made it in too short a time and with too short notice they might be absent.

Mr. BORAH. Why not make it on April 1? [Laughter.] Mr. TYDINGS. I think April 1 would illustrate the foolishness of the eighteenth amendment better than any other

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that if those who are advocating a change or modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment could agree among themselves as to the kind of resolution which they would like to have reported, it would expedite matters in the committee a great deal.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true. I ask that the clerk read the petition and the names of those who have signed it, and I also wish to renew my announcement that on March 30. as soon as I can obtain the floor, I shall file a motion for discharge of the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1932.

To the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned Members of the United States Senate, realizing the widespread interest and divergent opinions concerning resolutions dealing with the repeal and modification of the eighteenth amendment, which are now pending before your committee, do respectfully petition said committee to report said resolutions to the Senate of the United States in order that a vote may be had upon the same by the membership thereof.

Respectfully yours,
MILLARD E. TYDINGS. E. S. BROUSSARD. ROYAL S. COPELAND. B. K. WHEELER. TASKER L. ODDIE. JESSE H. METCALF. KEY PITTMAN. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE. HUEY P. LONG.

HIRAM BINGHAM F. C. WALCOTT. JAMES E. WATSON. GEORGE H. MOSES. HAMILTON F. KEAN. JAMES COUZENS. ROBERT D. CAREY. FELIX HEBERT HENRY W. KEYES. HARRY B. HAWES. ROBERT J. BULKLEY. OTIS F. GLENN.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before we vote I want to refer to two or three statements made by my distinguished friend from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], whom we all esteem most highly.

One of the statements of the Senator from Nebraska was, "You can not take a knife and cut them off"—meaning appropriations—"in the dark"; and again, "You must not take a knife and blindly cut appropriations 10 per cent." I just want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that that is not what is proposed at all. Here is a bill appropriating $125,000,000 and covering four departments. It is simply proposed to send it back to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to reduce the aggregate sum about twelve and a half million dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment. That does not take away the authority of the committee. For instance, the Senator from Nebraska read three amendments having to do with food, clothes, and drink for our foreign representatives under three special provisions of the bill, and he said that he was entirely opposed to them and they ought all to be stricken out. I agree with him entirely that they all ought to be stricken out, but the Senate is not going to strike them out; there is but one way in the world to get them out, and that is to recommit the bill, to send it back to the committee. If the committee reports that they be stricken out the chances are that they will be stricken out: but we know that, after the committee has gone over a bill and reported it back to the Senate, to strike out an appropriation on the floor of the Senate is almost an impossibility. The Senator never saw better proof of that fact than here a short time ago when we undertook to strike out certain provisions of another appropriation bill.

So, when the Senator says that there are certain appropriations that ought to be stricken out, and others that ought to be reduced in large measure and others in lesser degree, I want to say to him that if he wants to do that thing, the logical way to do it, the reasonable way to do it, the only possible way to do it, in my judgment, is to vote for this motion, let the bill go back to the committee, and have the committee do the will of the Senate. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. What assurance can the Senator give the Senate now that if his motion prevails, when the bill shall be reported back to the Senate the items which the Senator has just mentioned will be stricken out?

Mr. McKellar. I can not give the Senator any assurance, but I will say that I heard the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], the chairman of the committee, say that he thought that some of them ought to be stricken out, and I want to say that the chairman of the committee has more influence, I sometimes think, than all the rest of the members of the committee put together. He is a fair man, he is a just man, and he is trying to do his duty as a Senator and as a member of the Appropriations Committee; and I, for one, am willing to trust him, though he does not belong to the party to which I belong. I believe he wants to do the fair thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator-

Mr. McKellar. Just a moment. And when the Senate directs a bill to go back to the Appropriations Committee with instructions to cut down the aggregate appropriations 10 per cent, I am absolutely sure that the Senator from Washington will join whole-heartedly in that program; that he will summon the necessary department chiefs before the committee and ascertain the best way to reach the result, as was so well explained by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg] a few moments ago. The committee can do it; it can do it with knowledge; it can do it with more accuracy than can the Senate as a body; and I believe that is the only way to do it at such a time as this. I now again yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is willing to trust the Senator from Washington, and thinks that through his great influence with the committee the bill will be reported back with these items stricken out, why is the Senator not willing to trust the Senator right here on the floor of the Senate and let us make a motion to strike them out and see what will happen?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want the pending motion displaced. If the motion shall carry, it will make no difference whether we strike them out or not. The desire of the Senate would be made evident by the adoption of the motion; and while these three amendments might remain in the bill. I want to say that if the Appropriations Committee does not follow the suggestion of the Senator from Washington about these three items and does not follow my suggestion about them-and I am in hearty accord with the Senator from Washington as to these proposals. I do not think they ought to be in the bill at all, and I expect to support a movement in the committee to strike them out-if they remain in the bill as reported back to the Senate, then the Senator from Nebraska can make a motion to strike them out, and I want to say to the Senator I am going to vote with him if when the bill comes back such a motion is made.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator another question. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator thinks that the committee is going to strike out these three items or that that is the way to get them stricken out, I want to ask him if he is not inconsistent in moving to recommit the bill to the committee on the theory that the committee is going to strike them out when the committee has already acted on those three items and has increased the appropriations in every one of them?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKellar. I understand that the committee has increased the amounts, but I do not think I am inconsistent. Why? Because when the committee agreed to them they never had any idea that the Senate, as a body, was going to bring about a real reduction, if it could. But the Senate has gone on record as being very much in favor of cutting down not only these three items but perhaps a thousand other items in the bill. These three items are not the only items in this bill that ought to be stricken out; there are, in my opinion, innumerable other items in this bill that ought to be very carefully gone into and changed. To undertake to do it by piecemeal, assuming that the Senator is right, and that the whole Senate unanimously want to take out these three items, I think it is a useless thing to do now, because we ought to have the bill as a whole referred back to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator another question. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is in favor of striking out these items, and he says that the chairman of the committee is in favor of striking them out, and both the Senator and the chairman of the committee were in the committee when they were increased, why were they not stricken out there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I stated on yesterday that I was in favor of practically none of the increases in this bill.
Mr. NORRIS. We want to decrease the appropriations by striking the items out.

Mr. McKELLAR. We all know that the Senator has had a great deal more experience here than I have had; he has been here much longer; he is a remarkably able man; but I want to say that the Senator is doing everything he can, by voting against the pending motion, to increase the appropriations for items in this bill rather than to reduce them, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator another question. Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. We have already sent one bill back to the | committee, with some kind of instructions fastened to it. Assuming that the pending motion is to be agreed to, and this bill is to be sent back, is it the intention of the Senator to offer a similar motion as to every other appropriation bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have said that, but I want to make this explanation, if I may.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that he does that, and that all the other appropriation bills are likewise recommitted, though a good many of them are still in the House, and some have not even been reported to the House, does not the Senator believe that when the House finds out that that is going to be the treatment accorded to every appropriation bill, it will simply tack on 10 per cent more, if the Members of the House think the appropriations are necessary, in order that the Senate may bring about the reduction and the House may have the appropriations it thinks ought to be provided?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me answer the Senator. No; I do not think anything of the kind. I want to say to the Senator that I served in the House, as he did, and I have the very highest opinion of the House-

Mr. NORRIS. So have I.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait a moment; let me answer the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator must not put me in a different attitude toward the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to show what attitude the Senator is putting himself in. I do not believe that the House will increase the appropriations because the Senate has indicated its purpose to reduce them. Instead of that, I believe-and I have been reliably informed-that the House welcomes the reduction of appropriations on the part of the Senate and will cooperate with the Senate in still further reductions if we but make them.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me say to the Senator that, like him. I have the highest opinion of the integrity and patriotism of the House; but if I were a Member of the House, and I had my way in the case of an appropriation bill, and got an appropriation right where I thought it ought to be, and knew that when a bill got into the Senate the Senate was going to cut it down 10 per cent, I would vote in the House to increase it 10 per cent, so as to get what I wanted.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator might do that; I do not believe I would.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I was just going to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if under similar circumstances, he being a Member of the Senate, the House peremptorily increased the appropriation 10 per cent, would he not correspondingly make the reduction 20 per cent in order to reach the same end?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator in order to reply to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. NORRIS. We could do that, of course; but whenever we commence that the next bill will be increased 20 per cent instead of 10.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. And so they can defeat our action in any contingency; they ought to do it; and I am not finding fault with it; I would do it myself, if I had an opportunity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Nebraska, and will he now allow me just a moment or two to say what I desire to say?

Mr. NORRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not realize that he had not spoken on this question previously, or I would not have interrupted him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in conclusion I merely want to say-and I hope the Senator from Washington will not object to my saying what I am going to say-that in a talk I had with him this morning he said if this motion were adopted and it was shown that there was a desire upon the part of a majority of the Senate to cut these appropriations 10 per cent, that hereafter, instead of reporting the appropriation bills as they have been reported. he saw no use of doing that, but would simply reduce the amount 10 per cent below the House totals, and in that way carry out the will of the Senate. It seems to me that that is a very proper and a very fair attitude to take: it is just such an attitude as I expected the Senator from Washington to take; and I hope he will confirm it here. because I think that is the only proper and right way to reach what we have in mind.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think the statement of the Senator from Tennessee is substantially correct. I stated that if the Senate at this time should vote to recommit this bill to committee with instructions to bring about a reduction of 10 per cent in the appropriations it provides I would take that to be an expression of the policy decided upon by the Senate; and while I might be in favor of a greater reduction than 10 per cent, I would be in favor of taking the bills as they come from the House and decreasing the appropriations instead of increasing them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator. Mr. President. I now ask for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The year and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the general question underlying this debate, but my sentiments on the question of the need of drastic reductions of Federal expenses are very well expressed in two editorials, one from the Commonweal, a weekly publication of the city of New York, and the other from the Boston Post. I ask that these editorials may be printed in the RECORD in connection with this debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order is made.

The editorials referred to are as follows:

[From the Commonweal, New York, March 16, 1932] FACING FACTS

To borrow new money at the rate per day of $24,350,000, even if the United States Treasury is the borrower, rather staggers the conservative imagination. It is all the more staggering when only a small fraction of the new money is to go for construction of permanent values. Yet all present indications (aside from oppermanent values. Yet an present indications (aside from optimistic official statements) point to this huge sum as the daily average of new borrowing requirements by the Federal Government between now and June 30 of this year. In all it will mount to a total of nearly $3,000,000,000 added to the public debt in four short months. It will represent that part of the probable fiscal year's deficit of $4,250,000,000 not yet borrowed from the patient public.

Figures have recently become rather odious to many people-Figures have recently become rather odious to many people—especially since everyone, high and low, has been obliged to use large minus signs in most of their figuring. In the present instance, however, we are only partly concerned with figures, and much more deeply and anxiously concerned with the human and social consequences of the figures. Signs of strain both in the business and governmental credit structures are multiplying. What does this strain imply? What, if anything, is being done to ease it? If nothing is done, what effect will the increasing strain have upon the lives and welfare of millions of humble citizens to whom financial operations, as such, are remote and strain have upon the lives and welfare of millions of humble citizens to whom financial operations, as such, are remote and bewildering? Do we not need, even more than courage, and even more than blind faith, an American leadership that is ready to face realities with utter ruthlessness and to restore economic order and human hope through applying the simplest standards to even the loftlest problems?

The present debts of the world are appalling. Most of them are not being paid off. Instead they are being multiplied through the process of adding new current debts to old frozen ones. Debts based on land values and on crops and the products of the mines are frozen because the prices of those products have fallen. Their prices are far below the level at which loans were made with the land or its products as security. That is one part of the picture.

But far more than a drop in prices is involved. Similar prices dropped 40 per cent in one year during the 1920-21 depression, but business recovery set in even before prices stopped falling. To-day, in addition to price declines, the speed of business itself To-day, in addition to price declines, the speed of business itself has dropped. Instead of having buying activity increase as prices fell (a fact which gave the basis for prompt recovery in 1921) the general use of currency and bank deposits has dropped nearly 60 per cent in the last two years. What the business man calls "turnover"—or the number of times a year he can make a profit on his invested capital—has dropped at a similar alarming rate.

The merchant who could "turn over" his goods six times a year in 1929, with a small "gross" profit on each occasion, finds to-day that he can turn over the same quantity of goods only twice—making only two small profits in the year instead of six. These reduced "gross" profits for the year are barely enough to pay his running expenses. He has almost nothing left to pay his borrowings at the bank. Loans he hoped to pay off in three months he can barely meet in a whole year. Thus business loans as well as commodity loans are "frozen." New borrowings are added in order "to keep going." The outstanding and unsettled credit is increasing and the means to pay it off are diminishing. It is an unexpected and grave "second phase" of the depression—something we did not have to face in 1921, when only prices fell and "turnover" activity actually increased.

To top this off, and to add immeasurably to the crushing burden of unsettled debt, we have the spectacle of the Federal Government itself plunging wildly into increasing debt at the astounding rate described above. Nowhere is there the least sign of a leader-ment itself plunging wildly into increasing debt at the astounding rate described above. Nowhere is there the least sign of a leadership ready to call a halt, to cut Government salaries to the bone until they are on a par with the slashed salaries of private business employment, to admit a crisis and face it, to say that the Government must not and shall not, without the gravest cause, compete for borrowed money with the already overstrained borrowings of frozen business.

There has probably never been in peace times a more flagrant abuse of the public borrowing power than we are witnessing to-day—not alone at Washington, and with the consent of leaders to-day—not alone at Washington, and with the consent of leaders in both parties, but also in States, counties, and municipalities. Every one of these agencies, with a few such outstanding exception as the State of Maryland, is adding millions daily to the mountain of frozen debt—and doing it either through willful extravagance or in the subtle illusion that by increasing debt we can restore a business activity which the very fact of excessive debt itself is suffocating.

The mere handicap to crippled business of a growing public debt is less ominous, however, than certain practical human consequences which only a sudden reversal of Government policy can avoid. First, there is the prolonging of unemployment due to the further strain on business credit. Then there is the fact that when the Government competes with business in the already strained money markets, the inevitable result over the period is to increase interest rates for all borrowers.

The supply of funds to-day is diminishing rapidly. The net increase interest rates for all borrowers.

The supply of funds to-day is diminishing rapidly. The net balances of bank depositors have been cut by a third in the last seven months—from over $6,000,000,000 to just over $4,000,000,000, for example, in the reporting member banks of the Federal reserve system. Thus the probable demand of the Government for $3,000,000,000 of new loans before June 30 comes at a most unfortunate time. Interest rates on Government securities will undoubtedly be forced up by this obvious fact of diminished supply and increased demand. And as interest rates on "governments" rise, the prices of all other high-grade bonds, including those held by great savings and insurance institutions, will decline still further. Can Federal expenditures for pay roll for prohibition enther. Can Federal expenditures for pay roll, for prohibition enforcement, and for credit pools possibly do enough good to offset the broad social effects of such an attack on the immediate security behind the life's savings of tens of millions of working people? We think not.

people? We think not.

Taxes must be raised to stop the need for wild Government borrowing. To that we readily agree. But the whole notion of public duty in both parties in Washington must also be raised. If this is a war against economic and social disaster, the Government itself must go on war rations. Only determined and wise leadership can bring this about. The spirit to accept what the whole world of private business has already been forced to accept must spread from the President to the lowest-rated file clerk, and from the highest admirals and generals right to the forceastle. and from the highest admirals and generals right to the forecastle and the tail-end squad. Then, and only then, can the new taxes be justified. The existing debts of the world are insupportable.

But unnecessary fresh debts would be intolerable.

[From the Boston Post] HOW TO DO IT

The movement in Congress for a reduction of Government salaries may sound impressive, but as a measure of real economy it is only a drop in the bucket. At best it will yield only a few million dollars. The cost of government can not be effectively cut million dollars. The cost of government can not be effectively cut by piecemeal.

The money saved on salaries will quickly be frittered away by Congress. What is needed is a realization that the whole machinery of government is expensive beyond all reason.

There can be no real relief for taxpayers until Congress tackles the matter in a wholesale way. Savings should be by hundreds of millions instead of by single millions. Each year sees a huge piling on of the cost of government.

Aside from the Post Office Department and perhaps the Treasury Department, the budgets for the various departments could be cut in halves by dropping the thousand and one useless bureaus and cutting off various activities, none of them useful.

But even drastic measures of economy would be wasted unless Congress ceased the practice of pouring out hundreds of millions for the "relief" of various interests having great vote-controlling power.

The Farm Relief Board has spent around $500,000,000, all to no purpose whatever. The money is lost. And yet the call is for still more funds.

Various costly irrigation projects, which never pay their way, only add to the plight of the farmers. The great Hoover Dam undertaking will probably be a constant drain on the Treasury for the benefit of a small section of the country.

Until reckless spending by Congress is halted there can be no actual economy in government. The problem is our biggest one and ought to be tackled in a big way. But so long as Congress persists in bidding for votes by digging into the Public Treasury there is no hope for even checking the wholesale waste of public

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the case of most of these items the money is appropriated to carry out existing law. We can not change such appropriations; they have got to be appropriated in full, because of the fact that they are to cover outstanding obligations of the Government made in accordance with law, and appropriations must be made every year to cover those particular items.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I do not understand that every time the Congress authorizes an appropriation the appropriation has to be made.

Mr. SMOOT. The appropriation has to be made wherever a law has been passed which says that hereafter the appropriations shall be such amounts.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, the work can not be carried on if there is no appropriation to carry it on with; can it?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true as far as the activities of the Government are concerned, the amounts that we appropriate for the departments; but appropriations will be made to carry out existing law. I want to say to the Senator from Michigan that I shall now, if I can get time, go into those very appropriations. I did it about 10 years ago, to find out just exactly what they were. The next move I want to make, if I can possibly get time to do it, is to take some of those existing laws and have the Congress repeal them, and not keep appropriating for those purposes every year. I think we can save a great deal of money in that wav.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question on the very subject about which the Senator from Michigan asked. Take an appropriation for some line of officials in the Department of Commerce, for instance, in foreign lands. The law provides for the appointment of those officials. It also provides what their salaries

Mr. SMOOT. I did not refer to cases like that. Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator about this particular case, and I think that is what the Senator from Michigan had in mind.

This appropriation bill commences to operate on the 1st of July next.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we pass a law now cutting off the appropriations, let us say, for 100 men who are in one of these departments in Europe or South America or Central America. They would have notice that after the 1st of July there would be no salary for them.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. And on the 1st of July they would all quit.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly.
Mr. NORRIS. So that even though we have a law that says, "So and So in this position shall draw a salary of $10,000," if we do not appropriate for it he does not get it; and it is not an injury to him if, in advance, he has several months' notice that his job has disappeared.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is true, Mr. President. I know that, and what I stated had no reference whatever to that. If I can get time I will ascertain the amount of appropriations made for those very purposes. I have had it in the past. That, however, does not apply at all to the employees who are appropriated for every year in our general appropriations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Mr. KING. I do not want to misunderstand my colleague, and I may not do so. It occurs to me, if I understood my colleague's position, that he would abrogate what I conceive to be the rule acknowledged by all, that the acts of one Congress do not bind succeeding Congresses.

Let me illustrate. For instance, there is a positive law that our sinking fund shall be created, and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall take sufficient of the revenues for the purpose of providing for the sinking fund. Notwithstanding that is a positive law, and automatically he is authorized to take money to create and maintain the sinking fund, nevertheless if by this or any other bill or by all bills we should not make provision for it, he would not be justified in taking it, notwithstanding there is a law upon the statute books, because this would be pro tanto a repeal of existing law; and that is true with nearly all of the laws which my colleague, as I understand, contends require us to make an appropriation every year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not make any such contention. The language of these provisions quite often used to be that "hereafter" there should be appropriated so much. We do not find that in any appropriation bills lately; but I remember that 15 or 16 years ago the bills quite often said that "hereafter" there should be appropriated, for a particular purpose, so much every year.

I know that a lot of those "hereafter" appropriations ought to be abolished. They are not in the annual appropriation bills; and they are the ones to which I had reference. I do not have reference to the bills that we pass upon here every year, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes: I yield.

Mr. LONG. If we fail to put in an appropriation bill one of these so-called hereafter appropriations, would not that, ipso facto, be a repeal of the law? In other words, if the appropriation bill failed to carry an appropriation that a previous statute required it to carry, that would be an action of Congress nullifying the law, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but I want to say that it never has been done, and the appropriation has always been carried.

There is only one other thing I desire to mention. The Senator from Nebraska referred to the tariff law that he said was "mountain-high," with rates "reaching the sky," and contended that it is interfering with our trade in the world and having an effect upon the business of our country.

Senators, the Treasury statement of March 18, 1932, just a few days ago-that is the last statement I have upon my desk-shows that notwithstanding the decrease in the value of goods imported into the United States of every name and nature, our customs receipts for the present fiscal year up to this time were $261,547,307.15. For the same period of the last fiscal year they were $277,498,605.97. There is a difference of only 5 per cent in the two amounts. That is what is happening as to goods coming into the United States under the present tariff act. Those figures show, as far as they are concerned, that there is more yardage, there are more pounds, there are more goods coming into the United States, even under the conditions existing to-day, than there were a year ago. That is the effect of the present tariff law under existing conditions.

Suppose that this awful world-wide decline had not taken place: Our importations then would have been perhaps 50 per cent more than they are. As they are now, there is more yardage, as I say, and more goods coming into this country; and when they come in I want to say to the Senate that of course they throw just that many men out of employment in the United States, and give the employment the bill with instructions. On that question the yeas and nays have been demanded. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] to recommit

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. Con-NALLYI, who is absent on account of death in his family. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swansonl, who is necessarily absent. I find that I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. Hale]. I do so and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Stephens]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. COPELAND (when Mr. Wagner's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WAGNER] is detained by official business of the Senate. If he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Cutting]. I find that I can transfer that pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I do so and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Brookhart] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis];

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Goldsborough] with the

Mr. WHEELER. The pair of my colleague [Mr. Walsh of Montanal has been announced. I wish to state that my colleague was slightly indisposed and had to leave the Chamber before the vote was taken.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I had better make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, or make a statement at any rate. There are four departments included in the bill which has just been recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. Each one, of course, is independent of the other. I take it that the 10 per cent reduction is to apply to each department separately, for instance, 10 per cent with reference to the Department of State.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the motion iself determines that. Only one bill was presented.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A single motion was made to recommit with instructions, so that the committee will have an opportunity of making the reduction covering all the items in the entire bill.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The language of the motion is "in the aggregate."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true.

AMENDMENT OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that everything after the enacting clause be stricken out and that the substitute which I have offered be considered, and that the substitute be open to amendment just as the original text would have been.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I see no reason for the substitute being read at this time, as I understand we are not to proceed further with legislative business this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute will be printed and printed in the RECORD.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposed by Mr. Harrison to the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes, was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 is amended to read as follows: "SEC. 336. Recommendations for adjustment of duties: (a) Upon the request of the President of the United States, or upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested party showing good and sufficient reason therefor, the commission shall investigate and ascertain the differences in the cost of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article, whether or not actually imported into the United States. If the commission finds it shown by the investigation that the duty imposed by law upon the foreign article does not equalize the differences in the cost of production of the domestic article and of the foreign article when produced in the principal competing country or countries, then the commission shall report to the President and to the Congress such increases or decreases in the duty upon the foreign article as the commission finds to be necessary in order to equalize such differences in the cost of production. Any such increased or decreased duty may include the transfer of the article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list, a change in the form of duty, or a change in classification. The report shall be accompanied by a statement of the commission setting forth the findings of the commission with respect to the differences in cost of production, the elements of cost included in the cost of production of the respective articles as ascertained by the commission, and any other matter deemed pertinent by the commission.

BURIAL SITES FOR WICHITA INDIANS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate, and invites the attention of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier], the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3409) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands. The amendment was, on page 2, line 8, after "purposes," insert "And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the Indian owners all coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits found at any time in the land."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will not the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs explain the purport of the bill and the effect of the amendment?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the bill merely authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and other bands. I have consulted with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and he is perfectly willing that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I have a short resolution, which relates to a matter of rather great importance to witnesses who testified in Alabama in the Heflin-Bankhead controversy, which I would like to have read. It will take me only about a minute to explain it.

Mr. McNARY. Will not the Senator wait until to-morrow, when we will have a morning hour?

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that I desire to have the resolution acted on now by reason of the fact that we thought we had appropriated money to pay the witnesses in the election contest in Alabama, but we find that the committee did not pay all the witnesses. They paid certain clerks here in Washington and a part of the stenographic bill. The witnesses for the contestee have been waiting for their money for two months. The witnesses for the contestant were promptly paid.

Mr. McNARY. Is there any objection from the Committee on Privileges and Elections to the proposal?

Mr. BLACK. I can not imagine it is possible that there would be any objection to paying the witnesses who testified two months ago.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to have the resolution read. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 188), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, authorized by resolution of February 28, 1931, to hear and determine the pending contest between John H. Bankhead and J. Thomas Heffin, involving the right to membership in the United States Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $1,142.76 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized for such purpose, said sum to be used to pay witnesses for contestee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be received, and, under the law, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, before I yield the floor I would like to ask now that the chairman of the committee make a report on this resolution to-morrow, because of the fact that there can be no possible excuse for any longer holding up the payment of the witnesses for the contestee. The others were very promptly paid.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Boston Financial News of February 2, 1932, concerning S. 3256, which I introduced on January 25, "To protect and foster trade and commerce, to supplement the powers of the Federal Trade Commission, and for other purposes."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Financial News, Boston, Mass., February 2, 1932] LEAVES FROM THE NOTEBOOK OF THE OLD-TIMER

(While the laws that govern stock-price movements are not immutable there is much that can be reduced to formula by thorough analysis of the history of the market and the forces that have been applied to it. The spectacular market of the past few years, while blazing a new trail, nevertheless acted in a manner comparable with other markets in bygone years, and had the thousands of new security buyers been cognizant of the history of those markets they might have seen the danger signals in time enough to prevent disaster. It is with this thought in mind that we present the observations of the Old-Timer from week to that we present the observations of the Old-Timer from week to week. The Old-Timer has seen markets come and go, and has had an intimate contact with Wall Street for more than a quarter of a century. It is our hope that you may read from them lessons that will teach you how to accept Wall Street's opportunities and reject its lures.—ED.)

NEED TO SCRAPE BARNACLES OFF THESE LAWS

Let's get the good ship "American Commerce" ready for her 1932 cruise by scraping the barnacles of antiquated antitrust laws off her keel, and by polishing her sides with assurances of a better revenue for the railroads.

Moves in these directions are already being made in the efforts Moves in these directions are already being made in the ellotts of important industrialists, railroad executives, and economists to obtain a modification, if not an outright repeal, of our stultifying antitrust laws, and for an unconditional and retroactive repeal of the "recapture provision" of our national railroad act of 1920. There is a crying need for legislative action on both of these proposals. It is to be hoped that they will both have speedy enactment by Congress.

'TWOULD HELP STABILIZE INDUSTRY

So vital to our economic progress is the proposed modification of our antitrust laws that the measure now providing for it is of our antitrust laws that the measure now providing for it is appropriately entitled a "stabilization of industry" bill.

As recently introduced into Congress by Senator David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts, this anti-antitrust bill seeks only a modification of the Sherman law, so as to make it possible for the Federal Trade Commission to decide, in advance, whether agreements for curtailment of production and other plans to avoid unnecessary competition shall be exempt from the ordinary operations of the antitrust laws.

HOPE TO MODIFY SHERMAN LAW

But, at all events, it will serve to scrape some of the barnacles off the Sherman law and afford direct and much-needed relief to general business.

Our antitrust laws—foremost among which are the Sherman and Clayton Acts—were originally designed to curb monopoly and to encourage competition.

But the world is now passing through a period of unexampled depression, produced in part by that overproduction which unrestrained competition promotes.

WANT TO ELIMINATE NEEDLESS COMPETITION

How to control competition without subjecting the public to extortion and running afoul of the antitrust laws is the problem which this so-called Walsh bill undertakes to solve.

The outstanding feature of this bill is the endowment of the Federal Trade Commission with new powers whereby it could act as arbiter in deciding to exempt specific instances of concerted moves to reduce production and prevent needless duplication and competition from the provisions of this law.

The filing of this bill in the United States Senate constitutes a sign of the times sign of the times.

Debate on this measure will turn on the probable perils of competition, alleged to be ruinous, and upon monopoly, alleged to be oppressive.

SHERMAN LAW TOO ALL-EMBRACING

That the Sherman and Clayton Acts have not accomplished all that was expected of them is well known. The whole theory on which they were based is once more reopening for discussion.

Many contend that these antitrust acts should be repealed in their entirety, inasmuch as they are already regarded in most quarters as dead letters in our national statutes.

Let us see what it is that the Sherman and Clayton laws are supposed to prohibit.

The Sherman law, enacted July 2, 1890, was intended to be a sweeping antimonopoly statute. It was enacted for the express purpose of prohibiting formation of any sort of contract or compurpose of prohibiting formation of any sort of contract or combination in the form of a so-called trust, which might operate "in restraint of trade." In effect, it declared that every person making any such contract, or engaging in any such combination or conspiracy, should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; also, that every person who "shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize or combine, or attempt to combine, any part of trade" shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a penalty not exceeding one year in the penitentiary and a fine of not exceeding $5,000. It likewise provided that all property so involved should be subject to forfeiture.

SHOWS DEPLORABLE LACK OF VISION

The Sherman law says in part:

The Sherman law says in part:

"Whenever it shall appear to the court, before which any proceeding under section 4 of this statute—giving jurisdiction to the United States circuit courts, regardless of where alleged offenses occur—may be pending and the ends of justice require that other parties shall be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not."

Obviously, the principal intent of this law was to stamp out unconscionable greed and ruinous competitive practices on the part of dominant industrial corporate combinations. But the net result has proved conclusively that the drafters of this act missed their mark by a mile. For, like many later statutes, this act failed completely to visualize the then undreamed-of growth of our country and the absolute need for colossal expansion of our industrial structure which assure the fulfillment of its ultimate destiny. destiny.

The Sherman law has never done anything except hamper such constructive development.

HAS HAMPERED INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

It has made every pretentious industrial combination a prospective victim of scheming political pharisees.

It has set the country back a century by throttling big business and placing a stigma of legal wrongdoing on magnificent projects merely because of their size.

CLAYTON ACT OFTEN MISAPPLIED

The Clayton Act was created during the first year of the World War.

This statute undertook to prohibit corporations from creating monopolies by indirect action, such as offering their products at special low prices until their competitors were driven out of Dusiness.

Trade agreements of all sorts, in restraint of barter and free competition, were thereby banned.

Any formal contract, by which the purchaser of an article or articles agreed not to buy some article or articles from a competitor of the seller, was also barred.

Other clauses of the Sherman law, sometimes called the "unfair actices" law, forbade holding corporations and interlocking directorates.

Authority was given to the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission to end these alleged discriminations wherever and whenever found.

PREVENT UNNECESSARY DUPLICATION

But the teeth of the Sherman law have been filed down considerably by obiter dicta of the United States Supreme Court in two of the most celebrated "dissolution" cases. In these "passing opinions" of the highest tribunal of our country it was clearly pronounced that all the so-called antitrust laws should be interpreted "in the light of reason" and that mere magnitude of size did not necessarily constitute a monopoly.

LXXV-419

The "age of reason" has since decreed that industry shall not be hampered, that corporate enterprises shall not be circumscribed or hamstrung, that constructive effort shall be rewarded so long as the motivating influence back of it reveals no ulterior purpose or unduly restrictive influence.

While destructive competition is acknowledgedly ruinous, it is now recognized by the courts that proper control of mass production is in direct harmony and accord with one of the most basic laws which have to do with the future welfare of our Nation—conservation.

It is also very clearly recognized that consolidations of the right kind tend to eliminate unnecessary duplication and wasteful competition petition.

In the case of almost all the companies which are now integral parts of big "combines" it is noteworthy that they formerly had too many salesmen selling articles differing very slightly, if at all, in value and price and covering identically the same territory.

It was often discovered that two or more relatively big enterprises were spending, let us say, $1,000,000 apiece on advertising, when, by spending $2,000,000 on one output, they could more than double the effectiveness of their advertising.

BOTH THESE LAWS HAVE STULTIFYING FEATURES

But until very recently the restrictive influences of the Sherman and Clayton laws have limited consolidations of a desirable kind in this country in their endeavors to expand vertically, and even horizontally, by an unreasoning enforcement of their provisions.

WASTEFUL DISTRIBUTION CAUSES LOSSES

But progress along these lines would be greatly facilitated by a modification of the antitrust laws, allowing the elimination of unnecessary duplication and wasteful competition.

The trend in this direction is being hastened by the casualties which have resulted from the ban on the elimination of needless competition.

While Secretary of Commerce, President Hoover estimated that fully $20,000,000,000 is wasted each year in inefficient distribution. This vast amount, or at least the bulk of it, could be saved by eliminating needless competition.

WALSH BILL COULD ACCOMPLISH MUCH

It is also contended that every line of business which has attained an important position within the last 20 years, both in the manufacturing and distributing departments, are eager to obtain from their trade organizations the statistics and cost-accounting systems which these organizations have compiled, showing accurately and conclusively what it costs to do business in their particular lines.

Under the Sherman antitrust law and former rulings of the Federal Trade Commission it has not been possible to use this information and these statistics to their full value without fear of the consequences.

But under the terms of Senator Walsh's bill it will be possible to use them for the purpose for which they were intended—to permit those who know what their costs are to agree not to make or sell goods at a loss and to obtain redress against those through ignorance or unscrupulousness, do otherwise.

ALL AGREE ON REPEALING "RECAPTURE CLAUSE"

On the score of the desirability of deleting the so-called "recapture clause" of the national railroad act, which is now incorporated in section 15-A of the interstate commerce act—it is noteworthy that the long-sought-for unconditional and retroactive repeal of this provision is now urged by a majority, if not by all, of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Since the enactment of this "recapture clause," the Interstate Commerce Commission has not prescribed rates which have not permitted the railroads, as a whole, to earn, in any year, a fair return, fixed either by statute or by the commission.

From 1921 to 1931, inclusive, the steam carriers failed to earn 5% per cent on the value of their property, as found by the commission.

commission

The indicated shortage in the "fair return" prescribed by the act, and also by the commission, is unquestionably in excess of $3,000,000,000,000, if the entire period is considered.

Furthermore, it is worthy of note that as of January 1, 1931, no less than $7,500,000,000 of railroad bonds were legal investments for savings banks but that this large total has now shrunken to less than $2,000,000,000.

RAILROADS DESERVE BETTER TREATMENT

I would go a step further than advocating the unconditional and retroactive repeal of this so-called "recapture clause" by recommending that the Interstate Commerce Commission make determined efforts toward the establishment of railroad freight rates which would permit the carriers to earn a fair return.

The repeal of the "recapture clause" without the substitution of a provision recognizing the needs of the railroads on the score of more adequate freight rates would be treated by investors as an abdication by Congress of all interest in the financial welfare of the railroads.

of the railroads.

By all means let us grant to the faithful steam carriers a return which will afford a reasonable profit for their services.

THE OLD-TIMER.

CONDITIONS IN AMERICA

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, a few days ago there was printed in the Kansas City Star, one of the great newspapers of this country, an editorial that is a challenge to every true American. Henry J. Haskell, who, I understand, wrote this editorial, entitled "What of America?" is a student of affairs. a thinker with vision and conscience. The Star has long been known throughout the Middle West as a fighter for good government, a defender of the public welfare.

In this editorial, "What of America?" public attention is centered in striking fashion on a most serious situation. The Kansas City Star states it clearly, succinctly, forcefully, patriotically

Mr. President, this Nation to-day seems helpless against the gangsters and the racketeers. The people who refused to pay tribute to Tripoli pay and pay and pay to Al Capone and his ilk.

When Colonel Lindbergh has to go to the underworld to deal for the return of his baby son-when the country admits that is the only answer to kidnaping-then I say it is time to think clearly and act decisively.

I ask permission to print the following editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I hope every Senator will read and consider it. I wish every American would read it carefully and prayerfully.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT OF AMERICA?

(A reprint of the editorial appearing in the morning edition of the Kansas City Star, March 14)

Two hundred years from the birth of Washington, who bequeathed to us a great heritage won through fire, sword, suffering, and self-sacrifice, we who are the inheritors find ourselves again under a yoke, abject and shameful subjects of a power enthroned by our own lethargy. This new despotism is symbolized by machine gun and bomb, by kidnaping, extortion, and racketeering. Its brazenness is exemplified by the picture of "Al" Capone seeking to barter his way out of jail as if the Lindbergh babe were his hostage, as well the child might be.

Must America bargain with its public enemies to restore a Must America bargain with its public enemies to restore a child to its parents? Must the child itself be sacrificed before a nation is aroused to its own ignominy?

The moral rot that other countries see in us is confirmed in the kidnaping of the child of Colonel Lindbergh—a tragedy that appalls and stuns. If the crime itself damns America's social organization, the necessary means taken to defeat it damn her public justice. Colonel Lindbergh can not be blamed for turning to gangdom, now in possession of our soil and citadels, and com-missioning the generals of its defiant army of occupation to re-cover his infant son.

LINDBERGH CHILD AMERICA'S HOSTAGE

The child is not his hostage alone; it is America's hostage to the forces that have seized our most precious liberties while we have slept. The time has come again when the drums should beat and the lights gleam from church tower to rouse us to our

This demonstration of the power of an encroaching dictatorship of crime is not new. It has been witnessed in all our cities; a slinking, treacherous power that preys upon the people, levying tribute, exacting its demands, enforcing its own punishments with ruthless and cruel disregard for all human rights, even to life

It is a shameful picture to paint in this year of the Washington bicentennial. That observance has produced much lip praise of the institutions which we Americans of this age, who did not create them and have done much to destroy them, claim as our own. By some process of muddy thinking we are able to spur ourselves into shouting and babbling that these institutions were bequeathed to us by Washington, but we haven't unwrapped them lately to see what they are.

WE MOCK OUR HERITAGE

We like to make speeches about the sufferings of George Washington and his Army at Valley Forge, but our own fortitude isn't great enough to take us to the polls, if it happens to be raining, to preserve what Valley Forge won for us. Even when we do reach the polls by the most extraordinary sacrifice of time from golf or bridge, we are told how to vote and for whom to vote. After this votary gesture before party fetishes, we go our ways, leaving too often in office puppet mediocrities who dance on strings pulled by the manipulating machines, many of which are allied to or a part of the new tyranny.

are allied to or a part of the new tyranny.

We celebrate Washington's anniversaries with oratory and brass bands—and cast the heritage he left to us into the nearest alley. When brass-throated orator and brass-throated band have run out of wind, hark to America's real acclaim of the Father of His Country and the institutions he bequeathed. Hark to the sounds of its laughter and revelry, and the rattle of the gangster's machine gun. These are America's true salvos of salute to George Washington. With them she has accomplished in a few short years of selfish pleasures and easy living the descent from the sunlit heights of freedom and glory, where he placed her, to the black and slimy depths of moral anarchy.

In the two-hundredth year of Washington's birth, America, reeling and laughing in her dance of madness, has come at this day to be the fulfillment of the word of the prophet:

"The heart of the fool is in the house of mirth, but the heart of the wise is in the house of mourning."

IGNOMINIOUS SURRENDER

There, in our revelry, in our unthinking, is cast up the account of our stewardship of Washington's heritage. Americans and all other peoples may read it. Ours is the most lawless country in the world. Its name is a scoff and a jeer.

Stern virtues of Pilgrim forefathers have drained away in years of ease and easy living. Privileges and preferment usurp the rewards of honest toil. Wordy phrases take the place of deeds and our social structure has surrendered to the enemy of corruption and crime. All must share the blame when this enemy lays war indemnities upon us. America's citizenship must render homage and crime. All must share the blame when this chemy lays war indemnities upon us. America's citizenship must render homage and pay tribute to the powers that be in their land. They are no longer the powers of America's organized society. There is another government of this country; it is the government of organized crime, and it exercises the power to levy upon us a constantly increasing burden.

Colonel Lindbergh had to treat with this other government in his State and country when their government of ordained law could neither protect his family from violence nor give him justice against it. He had to treat with the powers that be, and so do all Americans when those powers put pistols to their heads.

Americans, did we say? They may bear the name, but are they the breed of Americans Washington led across the Delaware that freezing Christmas night to surprise the enemy at Trenton, not far from the stricken home of the Lindberghs? That was in another age, when Americans were fighting barefoot in the snow to establish that there should be only one government in America. and that their own.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT

There now is another government in America. How has it come about? Americans of to-day did not try to stop the enemy at the walls. They let the invader in to seize and occupy our cities and then sued for terms upon which they might be permitted to live and pay tribute in the country Washington had bequeathed to free from tyranny and oppression.

them free from tyranny and oppression.

This conquest of a great nation by an internal enemy springing up from the jungles that nation had permitted to overgrow its once blessoming domain is the most shameful in history. The inheritors of the land did not strike a blow. Rich and lazy, we preferred paying to fighting. Ours is the history of all tribute-paying the more we paid, the more was demanded. The whole social organization surrendered. Cowed and intimidated, it gave with its tribute its political institutions to be debauched and its pampered body to be kicked.

THE VALLEY FORGE SYMBOL

Back a little way in history, a soldier, his bleeding feet wrapped in rags, his musket under his ragged coat to protect its lock from the snow, is marching mile on mile through the dark and cold of a bitter winter night. Ahead is his leader, the first captain of the age, serving without pay in what seemed in that black hour to be a lost cause. These two soldiers had taken up arms to free America. The fame of one of them now fills all the world. The name of the other is unknown. It can be found in no book or on no But if he is not known by name, he is known by monument. But if he is not known by name, he is known by the proudest title the history of the country he died to save that freezing night could bestow upon him. Like his great leader, he was an American. These two soldiers, the Commander in Chief of that army and the continental who left his bloody tracks in the snow, founded the greatest republic in the annals of man.

Is it to be recorded that they lived and suffered and strove in vain, and that their Republic, which they thought would be a boon to their countrymen for all time and a beacon to the oppressed of all lands, has been given back to the jungle by their descendants, the huddled, bleating, sheep-Americans of to-day?

NOT DEAD, BUT SLEEPING

Surely the spirit of Valley Forge can not be dead, for if it is, then not "What of America?" but alas for America! But we do not believe it is. Americans have been unthinking, careless, self-ish, but they can be aroused. Their pride in their land, their heritage, will yet bring them to its defense. Only 14 years ago, Americans were showing their mettle on the battlefields of France. The "Lost Battalion" was the spirit of Valley Forge flaming again. There was discipline, unity, consecration, self-sacrifice. These qualities surely remain in the great inert mass of our people. America, like China, has been a sleeping giant. The time has come for it to stir to the dangers, to act, and, in the action, crush out all the vicious, parasitic, and damnable usurpers.

To paraphrase Lincoln, America can not live free only in name and subject in fact.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION-PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi, in charge of the tariff bill, whether it is expected that debate will begin on it to-morrow, or whether there might be an opportunity, if we are not to proceed with the consideration of that bill, to take up House bill 9642, the emergency highway construction bill?

Mr. HARRISON. It was expected that we would proceed right along with the tariff bill, but the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] has just informed me that he can not be here to-morrow, and I told him that I thought there would be no objection raised, so far as this side is concerned, to laying aside temporarily the tariff bill for to-morrow, if there were other matters to come up. Of course, I have no objection to the Senator's bill coming up.

Mr. HAYDEN. I would like to give notice that if there is an opportunity to debate the bill to-morrow I propose to take advantage of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, just in order that there may not be any waste motion in this ma'ter, if the Senator proposes to ask unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business in order to take up the road bill, I shall have to object.

Mr. HAYDEN. If it is quite evident that there is to be no debate upon the tariff bill to-morrow and there is an opportunity for the Senator from Connecticut to make the speech which he desires to make, I hope he will make it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I really think that the Filipino independence measure is of more importance than the road bill, and if the tariff bill is not debated to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to consider that measure.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters.

BERT REDMON

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which Bert Redmon was confirmed as postmaster at Sallisaw, Okla., be reconsidered, and that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

This nomination was confirmed on Friday last in my absence and I had released it through inadvertence. The highest man on the eligible list is an ex-soldier, and therefore has a preferred status. The lowest man on the list was nominated. I desire to look into the situation further, and therefore I make this request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the nomination was confirmed is reconsidered, and by unanimous consent the nomination is recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

TREATIES

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Executive KK.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the treaties on the calendar may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaties will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina.

Mr. McNARY. By agreement between the Senators from North Carolina and the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Schall], that nomination will be passed over this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Watt H. Gragg to be United States marshal, middle district of North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN BOARD

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Vulosko Vaiden to be a member of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, all nominations of postmasters on the calendar will be confirmed en bloc.

This completes the calendar.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn, the adjournment being until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 23, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 22 (legislative day of March 21), 1932

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 22, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, our prayer to Thee is not an attempt to change Thy will, but to adjust our motives to the divine purpose. Thou hast said, "God so loved the world"-then it is not lost. Have pity when Thou lookest upon its marred face. Restore unto it everywhere the blessings of just and righteous government. Look upon our own country; may we have a boundless faith in its institutions and work unceasingly for its greatest good. Mold our decisions and determine their direction. Create within us heroic convictions, and may we be of tried metal in every hour of need. Make us men who bear in our own breasts the worth of man. God help him; he is more immature than wicked. By every widening of our affection for him we reflect the character of our Elder Brother. Grant that we may have this day the consciousness of having done cheerfully the things which are altogether worthy of our station and made an essential contribution to the stability of the Republic. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, before the special order is taken up to-day, may I ask the majority leader a question or two? Several Members have asked me about the Granata contested-election case. I wish we could have some agreement on a day certain to determine that case, if possible. The suggestion is made on this side because a great many of the Illinois Members have primary election contests, and they would like to have this go over until after April 12. As a matter of fact, I shall make the request for April 14 as a day certain, if the gentleman from Illinois could consider it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret that that would be impossible. We do not want to bring it up during the pendency of the tax bill, although it is a matter of the highest privilege. We will call it up immediately after the tax bill and make it the first order of business.

Mr. SNELL. It is somewhat uncertain when the tax bill will be finished. Could the gentleman agree that he would give this side at least three days' notice before the election contest is called up? I think that is only fair, so that we may have a definite day fixed.

Mr. RAINEY. I think before we get through with the tax bill we will be able to determine approximately the day that we will finish it.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is only fair that we should have two or three days' notice before the case is taken up.

Mr. RAINEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to have it fixed for the 14th of April, but if the gentleman can not do that, I hope that he will definitely announce it two or three days in advance.

Mr. RAINEY. The only definite thing that I can state is that we can not take it up during the consideration of the tax bill; but we will take it up immediately afterwards, and we will give the gentleman three days' notice.

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

The SPEAKER. Under special order, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Parks] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. PARKS. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. In order that I may call the attention of the House to the fact that we have from Ohio here this morning, in the gallery, the representatives of the Chiefs of Police and Sheriffs Association of Ohio. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I realize as much as any man who lives the critical condition of this country to-day and that the hour has come for every patriot of this land to give to this subject the most careful and thoughtful consideration. I have no criticism to offer of the members of the Ways and Means Committee that brought in the tax bill under consideration. I know the cross currents under which they labored. I know that here and there, their trail has been beset until they were unable to bring in a bill that was satisfactory to them, and I have no thought in my remarks of criticising the committee. I disagree with most of the bill.

I think, perhaps, for the first time in the history of this Congress, or at least during the years that I have been here, one of the leaders of this House felt it his duty to catechize and chastise the Members who were endeavoring to follow him. On the first day that the bill came up for consideration our distinguished friend took the floor to criticise those of us who dared to speak the language of the man who toils, and the man who labors, and then on a succeeding occasion there was broadcast one evening to the four corners of the earth, the statement that an insidious lobby was here undertaking to join with us to defeat the sales tax. Later on this same distinguished leader took the floor to further chastise us and say that Democrats following the Democratic platform and listening to the voice of humanity had gone further toward communism than any country in the world except Russia. I fling back into the face of those who criticise us in this way that we resent that criticism. Then finally, through a national hookup, it was broadcast to our constituents over the radio to send to their Congressmen a message telling them to lay upon the backs of the laboring people of this land $595,000,000 in taxes that the Congressmen think are unjust, and which the Democratic platform said you should not put upon the backs of the people as a matter of principle.

The first day the bill was under consideration and before the ink was dry upon it, one of our distinguished leaders said, "Oh, yes; it is a popular thing to say, soak the rich," and that has become the shibboleth of the men who are advocating this sales tax. I have no disposition to soak the rich, but I say to you now that whether you soak the rich or not, this patriotic band stands together and vows by all we hold sacred in this world that you shall not soak the poor. [Applause.]

I am just as jealous of the credit of our country as any man here. I am just as jealous of her credit and her faith as any man who walks this earth, but the fight that we made has brought about a change in this bill that will be for the benefit of the American people. If we can help it, you shall not take the sweat from the toil of the working people of this land and pay this deficit, but you must go to the accumulated fortunes of the men who brought on this infamous panic, and pay this deficit. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I vield.

Mr. RANKIN. It was intimated on the floor of the House on Saturday and carried throughout the press that those of us who are opposing the sales tax were excited and in no condition to legislate. As a matter of fact, the only people who were excited were the advocates of the sales tax who were opposing us.

Mr. PARKS. I think the gentleman is correct about that. Surely no man who is opposing this sales tax has got so excited that he would criticize unjustly the men who do not oppose it, in this great fight.

What is the bill before us? What does it do? It taxes everything, practically, that is manufactured in this world. It taxes the ice that you press to the fevered brow of your sick and your loved ones. It taxes the bread that you put in the mouths of the hungry. It taxes the shoes that you put on the feet of the barefooted. It taxes the clothes that you put on their backs. It taxes the hat that goes on their heads. It taxes every manufactured article, almost, known to man.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. It has been stated also, through the press and here, that those of us who, in accordance with the Democratic platform, are fighting a sales tax, are insurgents, when it is very evident that a great majority of this House is against the sales tax, hence those who are for it should be called "the insurgents."

Mr. PARKS. Not only that, but nowhere has any Democratic platform nor any Republican platform ever declared for this unholy tax that must be put upon the necessities of life, and not upon the ability of a man to pay and the man that has it. Why not levy a tax upon incomes? We have the lowest income taxes of any nation on earth which has an income tax. Why not go to the men that have ability to pay? Why not go to the men who have accumulated these fortunes, men who have hidden them out and taken them away and put them out of circulation? Why should we not lay our hands upon those vast fortunes that to-day have made this panic that we are now going through?

Three years ago this was a prosperous land. Three years ago the wheels of industry sang a song of happiness, of prosperity, love, and contentment. Millions of men bade their families good-by in the morning, with a full dinner pail on their arm, and went forth to make an honest living, happy in the thought that they were able to build a home and to buy for their loved ones. Then there came striding across this earth that great colossus who said. "Make me your leading official; make me your chief, and prosperity will not only continue but we will have an automobile in every garage; we will have two chickens in every pot." Lo and behold, three years from that time you not only do not have the automobile in the garage but you do not have the garage. You not only do not have two chickens in the pot but you do not even have the pot in which to put the chickens. [Applause.]

To-day over the head of every man and over the head of every woman disaster hangs like the sword of Damocles, and millions of men to-day are without work. In more than 8,000,000 homes the wail of the wolf of want is heard by day and by night, and famine, like a grim specter, wraps her shroud about her and goes from door to door, from coast to coast, and yonder in the White House sits that great mind, impotent and helpless, while men are without employment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say our crowd is not to be terrorized or intimidated by anybody. They have just begun to fight, and in the words of that immortal American who will live forever in the hearts of his countrymen, "We are standing to-day at Armageddon, battling for the Lord." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Howard] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, may I propound a unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAINEY. I have no desire to reply to the address just made by the gentleman from Arkansas; but I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the Record and just after the gentleman's address my radio speech to which the gentleman referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, is that the same radio address to which the gentleman referred, criticizing the Members of Congress who are opposed to the sales tax?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman will find nothing of that kind in it. That is the reason I want to press it at this

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, but if the gentleman's radio speech-

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman can have the regular order if he wants it. The regular order is that I am going to make a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. There is one unanimous-consent request pending.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, granted this day, I include the speech I made over a coast-to-coast network of the National Broadcasting Co. on Thursday night, March 17, 1932, beginning at 10.15 p. m., eastern standard time.

The speech is as follows:

The levying of taxes is one of the unpleasant duties devolving upon a Member of Congress; but when the necessity arises for the imposition of additional taxes, we must meet it with courage. No-body likes to be taxed.

body likes to be taxed.

There is under consideration to-day in the House of Representatives a tax bill which we will commence to read for amendments to-morrow, and which proposes to raise enough additional taxes to balance the Budget in 1933. The bill is being vigorously opposed upon the theory that we can balance the Budget by reducing the expenses of operating the Government or that we can balance it by imposing higher taxes on the big incomes and on the big estates, and the general public has the impression that Federal salaries are too large and they should be cut, that they should receive the same cut that business is now giving to its employees and which have been sanctioned by the labor organizations, and this amounts to a 10 per cent cut in all salaries. These propositions appeal very much to the taxpayers, and they have become convinced that this is the road out of our present difficulties.

difficulties.

To-night I expect to discuss the exact situation in which we find ourselves at the present time. The facts I am going to give you are the result of close study and the figures are official and are also corroborated by extensive research work.

At the present time our Federal deficit is greater than the deficit of any other nation in the world and is greater than the deficit of any nation at any time in the history of the world. We are not collecting enough money to run the Federal Government.

In 1931 we ran behind $1,123,000,000. Nearly half this amount was due to borrowing for the loans we made to veterans. At the present time the Federal Government is running behind $7,-82,000 every day, and unless we succeed speedily in balancing our Budget this daily deficit will not only continue but will be substantially increased. stantially increased.

The deficits for the fiscal year 1931 and for the fiscal year 1932 are not provided for in the Budget for 1933. It would be impossible to do that. These enormous amounts are being added, or will eventually be added, to the public debt. By the end of the fiscal year 1932 we will have added to the public debt $5,000,000,000 which must some day be paid. In other words, the public debt is | which must some day be paid. In other words, the public debt is almost back now to where it was when we commenced to reduce it a few years ago. If we can sell long-term Government bonds at 4½ per cent in the near future, and that is the least we can expect to pay, we will have added to the expenditures of this Government on the item of interest alone per year $210,000,000.

We have borrowed all we can. The Government's credit is destroyed. Recently some of our bonds were selling as low as 85.

When the announcement was made three or four weeks ago that we proposed to balance the Budget, Government bonds went up until these low-interest-bearing bonds are now selling around 91. Less than a year ago they were selling for 101. When the credit of a government is so destroyed that its bonds sell below par, as our bonds are doing, and when it can not borrow money at all on long-term issues, and when we are running behind nearly eight million dollars a day, the conclusion is inescapable that the Government is bankrupt and its solvency must be restored.

Our Federal Government has no assets except its public buildings which yield nothing in the way of revenues, and its public lands which yield no revenues, and which we can not even give away on account of the fact that they are practically worthless away on account of the fact that they are practically worthless except for grazing purposes.

The Members of both branches of the National Congress sit here as directors of the greatest corporation in the world, of which 120,000,000 people constitute the stockholders, and the 120,000,000 stockholders ought to be in favor of measures which will restore the solvency of the great corporation in which they are interested. Unless we do it, there is ahead of us in the immediate fortunes of the work of the suppose this suppose that the life. interested. Unless we do it, there is ahead of us in the immediate future, and it may come this summer, a panic the like of which no other nation in the world ever experienced. We must restore confidence in our banks. People are now hoarding their money, and over a billion and a half dollars have now been retired from circulation. We must restore the buying power of the people, and the first step in that direction is to restore the solvency of the Government itself.

It is a popular thing to "soak the rich" by taxes. Those of you who agree to that proposition will be pleased, I am sure, to know that we are doing it in this bill. We take in taxes approximately one-half of all incomes over $100,000 a year. This is as far as we are advised by economists we can safely go without reaching diminished returns. We are practically doubling the income taxes and surtaxes and we are lowering the exemptions. After having done all this we will still have left a Budget deficit of $1,241,000,000 for 1933.

are decreasing all governmental expenditures for 1933 by reductions made now in Congress as the Budget estimates come in of $125,000,000. We are, by administrative economies in the deof $125,000,000. We are, by administrative economies in the departments of the Government, accomplishing a saving of $100,000,000 more. Already governmental employees are being discharged in order to accomplish this, and Members of Congress are beginning to hear from it, but we expect to accomplish these economies, and this is as far as we can hope to go unless we reduce salaries of all employees of the Federal Government from the President

You will be interested in knowing what can be accomplished in You will be interested in knowing what can be accomplished in the way of salary reductions. It is popular to suggest that reductions be made of salaries of $5,000 and over that. I have been advising that course myself, but a 10 per cent reduction in all salaries of $5,000 and over will result in a yearly saving of approximately $3,500,000, which is less than half of the Federal Budget deficit for one day of time. If we reduce all salaries of $5,000 and more than that 20 per cent, the result would be that we will then have failed to overcome the Budget deficit the Government is now sustaining for one day.

will then have laised to overcome the Budget denot the Government is now sustaining for one day.

In order to accomplish any substantial cost saving, we are going to be compelled to reduce all salaries 10 per cent. If we reduce all salaries 10 per cent, from the President down, we will accomplish a cost saving in the operations of the Government of less than $58,000,000. In other words, we will only overcome the Budget deficit we are now sustaining for approximately eight days

I only speak for myself, but I have been compelled to the con-clusion that we must reduce all Federal salaries, little and big, for the psychological effect it will have on the country in the immediate future.

I might mention also that we are practically doubling the taxes on the big estates by these increases, but they will not be available during the fiscal year 1933. Therefore they do not help us much. It takes over a year to settle up an estate, especially a big estate. The Government will not get the taxes until the estates are settled. The next proposition which presents itself is how much can we reduce the ordinary expenses of the Government. It will surprise many of you to know that out of every $100 the Government expends $71.38 is expended on account of wars—wars which have been and wars which may occur in the future. It would appear to those of you who have not closely studied the question that reducing this amount ought easily to be effected, but I call your attention to the fact that $28.83 of that amount goes out in the payment of interest on war debts, and these bonds are held by our own nationals. This, of course, can not be reduced.

Of that amount $26.71 is expended on account of pensions to our own nationals. This, or course, can not be reduced.

Of that amount $26.71 is expended on account of pensions to soldiers of all of our wars and to their dependents. There is no way of reducing that. We can not close the hospitals and discontinue our pensions to disabled and aged veterans and their widows and dependents. None of you want to do that if you could.

I have now accounted for $55.54 of the $71.88 expended on account of war. That part of it can not be reduced. At the present the way and dependents.

ent time we are expending on account of our Army and Navy only $16.35 of the amount which I am enumerating as war expenditures. We hope to accomplish some reductions in that, but not much. Patriotic organizations throughout the United States are most vigorously protesting against reductions in the amount expended on the Army and Navy and thereby interfering with our national defense. This makes up the entire amount of $71.88 out of every $100 the Government expends. I would like to know how we could accomplish many substantial reductions there.

Out of every $100 which the Government expends, $9.03 goes for public improvements, good roads, improvements in rivers and harbors, and public buildings. If we stop building roads and stopped absolutely the work on rivers and harbors and stopped the building of public buildings and eliminated this entire expense, we will not have saved much, and the demand for roads, improved rivers, and public buildings is so great that we can not expect much reduction in this amount.

reduction in this amount

This leaves out of our $100 only $20 which we expend for carrying on all of the functions of this great Government of ours, amounting in all to eight hundred millions, out of four billion plus dollars we expend every year, and out of this $800,000,000 must come the reductions we expect to make.

We expect to accomplish a reduction in this amount of $225,-000,000 in the next year, and to that should be added approximately $58,000,000 if we cut all salaries 10 per cent, and in estimating our deficit we are already accounting for this reduction in expenses of $225,000,000. If we cut salaries and take out $58,000,000 more we will have left only $607,000,000 with which $58,000,000 more we will have left only $607,000,000 with which to carry on the functions of this Government.

These facts are unpleasant to a great many of you, but you ought to know about them. I might add to this, and I regret to do it, this additional fact, that in estimating our income for 1933 we include as receipts the $270,000,000, the allied nations will now owe us in 1933. Personally, I do not think they will pay a dollar of it. If they do not pay, our deficit for 1933 will be $270,000,000 more than we have estimated it to be.

We have also estimated that our receipts from income taxes in $270,000,000 more than we have estimated it to be.

We have also estimated that our receipts from income taxes in 1933 will be $1,100,000,000. It may be much less than this. I notice from newspaper items statements to the effect that it may be $300,000,000 less than this amount, and estimates they make are based upon the income-tax returns now coming in. If they are right about it, this will add to the deficit another $300,000,000. Personally, I can not believe that they are right, although I am sure there will be a substantial reduction below our estimates. The situation I am describing is not pleasant, but the millions of people who are listening to me to-night ought to know exactly what is happening. Our great deficit is not due so much to inof people who are listening to me to-night ought to know exactly what is happening. Our great deficit is not due so much to increased expenditures of the Government, although increased expenditures in part account for it, but in small part. Our deficit is due to diminishing returns in practically every item of national revenue. The income tax is our principal source of revenue. In 1932 our income from this source decreased $660,000,000 below the receipts for 1931. For 1933 we are estimating a further decrease of revenue from this source of $40,000,000. Personally, I now believe it will be much more than that amount, and the newspapers which are now estimating it at $300,000,000 may even be right about it. right about it.

I might go through the list of revenue receipts from all sources and they will all show decrease

This is go thindigh the last of revenue receipts from all sources and they will all show decreases.

We are proposing a general sales tax of $600,000,000 spread over the entire field of industry, exempting raw foodstuffs and canned foodstuffs, exempting every business with a turnover of less than $20,000, also exempting from its operation all farm products and the expenses of farmers for fertilizers and seeds. This is the kind of a tax in force now in practically every country in the world. It is an emergency tax. It will be an invisible tax, not perceptible to the purchaser of completely processed articles.

A tremendous opposition to this is being stirred up in the country. If it is defeated, we are going to be compelled to go to the high, objectionable war-time excise taxes, such as additional taxes on tobacco, on conveyances of real estate, on automobiles, on admissions to theaters of 10 cents and over, on radios and phonographs, on checks and drafts, on increased postage rates from 2 to 3 cents. Some or all of these taxes may be necessary to balance the Budget. It is a choice now, so far as the battle goes, between the general sales tax I have mentioned and the objectionable taxes like these. Of course, we must go to one or the other of these systems.

If you prefer a return to the war, time taxes may not prefer a return to the war, time taxes are a constant. systems systems.

If you prefer a return to the war-time taxes, your representatives in Congress will put them in. If you prefer the emergency general sales tax spread over practically the entire field of industry, therefore bearing lightest on the individual industries, your representatives in Congress will give you that kind of a tax. Members of Congress hear only from their constituents who are opposed to balancing the Budget, and the letters and telegrams they are receiving—I am receiving hundreds of them every day—are the result of propaganda sent out by the new type of lobbyists we have, whom I am calling invisible lobbyists. We never see them. They give no study whatever to the subjects they take up. Their effort is, in order to defeat certain propositions or to get higher tariff rates, to circularize the districts of Members of Congress asking the citizens that they write to their Members of gress asking the citizens that they write to their Members of Congress or wire them opposing or favoring certain propositions, and then we commence to hear from them; and if a Member of Congress hears from his constituents, whether what he hears is propaganda or not, he listens to it. We have had enough of these propaganda letters.

And in conclusion I want to ask all of my listeners to-night who are impressed by the facts I have been relating to wire or write their Members of Congress at once, insisting that the solvency of the Government be restored and that they vote to do it. If you prefer the sales-tax method, tell them that. If you prefer the more objectionable methods which you have already tried in war time, tell them to vote for that; but tell them, so that they can understand it thoroughly, to vote for these taxes and to do what they can to balance the Budget of the great corporation in which you are all interested as stockholders.

Member of the Congress and our presidential nominee out into the world defending the infamous thing known as a sales tax?

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. Every time this sales tax has ever come up in a National Democratic Convention it has been unani-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Howard is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, every American citizen with red things in his blood has difficulty in being calm in the presence of either a direct or an implied challenge to his patriotism. I shall be calm now, Mr. Speaker, for two reasons: The first is the command of my doctor. The second is that I do not want to inject anything here which might further increase the bitterness entertained by many Members of this House with reference to the sales tax.

Oh, I wish that my beloved leader by choice of the years ago, and my leader through only the call of love in this moment, might inject into this debate more of the views he entertained in other years as to this legislation, and less of his unhappy transformed views of to-day.

Those of us who have opposed the sales tax have been charged, impliedly, at least, with trying to Russianize this dear Republic of ours, and with creating a spirit of communism.

Mr. Speaker, who is now creating the spirit of communism in America? I declare to you my sincere belief that the daily conduct of those elements so largely behind the sales-tax proposition, without any reference at all to my colleagues here—the attitude of those men—is creating more of the spirit of communism in our country in an hour than a thousand street-corner, scap-box orators could create in a month. [Applause.]

I have heard it stated on this floor that one William Randolph Hearst was responsible for the bringing of this sales-tax proposition before our House.

I want to be fair toward all men. I hold no brief for William Randolph Hearst. I accepted his invitation to go to Canada to study the sales tax. I was his guest. I am glad to say he treated all of us very courteously, and I am here to testify that so far as I knew he did not, even by inference, try to impress us with his view regarding the sales tax while we were in Canada. But I am glad I went to Canada. I saw at first hand the workings of the sales tax, and God forbid that those workings should ever be carried to my own country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, what is the chief object of the sales tax, or, rather, what is the chief object of its promoters-meaning, of course, not at all any colleagues of mine in the The chief object of the real promoters of the sales tax is to build up a system of taxation in the United States under the terms of which those who are able to pay will have a large measure of the burden of taxation removed from their shoulders and laid upon the shoulders of those less able to pay.

In fine, it means, carried to its legitimate conclusion—just as it means in Canada—that soon or late there will be so much of a sales tax collected from the common herd in our country that the Congress will be called upon to lift the burdens of income taxation which now rest upon the shoulders of the uncommon herd. That is all there is about it.

We have read in the newspapers in recent hours that this sales-tax feature of our bill is going to be sugar-coated in a manner to win to its support those of us who are opposed to the principle of the tax. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that any one of the progressive Democrats and progressive Republicans with whom I have been associated in opposition to this bill can be brought to desert a principle by any sugar-coating of this legislation by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would just like to talk a little to Democrats alone. [Laughter.] If it be trueand it is true-that the Democratic Party has always been the party of the people in this country, what will the people whom this party is supposed to represent have to say to us during the approaching campaign if we shall send every up in a National Democratic Convention it has been unanimously condemned.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, yes, it has, and it will be condemned by the approaching Democratic National Convention. [Applause.] But I want to ask you Democrats to think of this seriously. Do you really want to see a Democratic President occupying the chair of state here in Washington? Do you? Do you believe that you can send a presidential candidate out to plead the cause of a sales tax before the common people with any assurance whatever of his election? Why, no; you do not. You do not believe anything of that kind. It is not possible.

Oh, my friends, I wish I might be privileged to speak to you very vigorously this morning. If I could, I would like to paint a word picture of a wonderful house on a high hill. a beautiful house, and over the door of that house in letters of silver and gold would appear the words "The House of Victory."

Now, pretty soon we are going out on a march toward that house. Here in this House to-day we will act in manner to make possible the entering of the Democratic hosts into the door of that house of victory or we will act in manner to have the Democrats stopped at the very threshold of that door-stopped by their own suicidal act in passing a sales tax. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, may I speak a little while longer? [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. First I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the gentleman who holds a mortgage on the Democratic Party, Mr. Raskob, is in favor of this sales-tax monstrosity?

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman from Wisconsin is more acquainted with mortgage holders than I am.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HOWARD. Oh, yes.
Mr. BLANTON. Neither Mr. Raskob nor anybody else holds any mortgage on the Democratic Party. The gentleman from Wisconsin will learn that when the Democrats of this House get through with the so-called nonpartisan sales tax the Democrats of the Nation will still have plenty of confidence in the Democratic Party. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I hope so.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman has talked about our march toward Democratic victory in the next election, and I would like to ask the gentleman's reaction to this fact: The President of the United States at no time has said in any public statement that he is in favor of any pay cut in Federal salaries. If the gentleman, like myself, wants to see a Democratic President of the United States, does he not think that the Economy Committee had better take a vacation? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, instead of having the Economy Committee take a vacation, my best wish at the moment is that instead of a vacation the Economy Committee get busy and bring into this House a proposition to do away with every useless board and Federal commission created by the President [applause]; and, further than that, to bring in legislation to reduce temporarily, at least, the salary of every public official in the higher brackets, including my own. This is what I think the Economy Committee ought to do. [Applause.] I do not speak from the standpoint of a man who has so much money that he can afford to give away two or three thousand dollars of his salary, but God and men know that we, as Members of this Congress, can better afford to sacrifice one-fourth of our salary and still be in better attitude to live and to eat than millions of American citizens who but a little while ago were even better financially fixed than we are.

I do not want to be regarded as a demagogue, but if my advocacy of human rights as against money rights shall win me that designation, then I shall accept it as a badge of honor. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I want to go over here and talk a little bit to my sales-tax brothers on the other side of the aisle. [Laughter and applause.] Now, my brothers—brothers in name, but not in fact—I sympathize with you.

Mr. SNOW. We do not need it.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, you do need lots of sympathy. I sympathize with any man belonging to a political organization who is unable to look up to the titular head of that organization and discover one single act or one single principle ever performed or advanced by that titular head for the cause of human rights as against money rights, which anyone here present or elsewhere can go out and plead to the world and ask its acceptance. [Applause.]

We who are opposing this or any other form of sales tax have several times been admonished to pause and consider what we are doing. My reply is that we have carefully considered our course of action. The question we are discussing presents a fundamental difference of viewpoints. We hold no animosity toward wealth as such. We recognize that great wealth may be honestly acquired and properly employed. But we know that the great concentration of wealth in this country has, to a large extent, been the result of governmental favoritism-favoritism of tariffs, financial control, and similar advantages by which, year by year, a smaller and smaller number of our citizens acquire a larger and larger proportion of all the wealth of the country. Added to these economic advantages, the wealthy citizens have not been compelled to bear burdens of taxation which weigh upon them to the extent that taxes weigh upon the ordinary citizen. Our primary purpose in this fight is to raise the revenue from those who are best able to pay. You talk about our proposals being confiscatory upon those of great wealth. Let me reply to that by asking you, What ordinary individual to-day would not be glad to have an income which compelled him to pay the increased surtaxes which we have provided in the higher brackets?

This is a time of stress and the average citizen is not in a position to meet his present burdens, much less to have additional ones imposed upon him. The heavy burden of taxation which we are compelled to impose upon some one should be placed upon those who are best able to carry that burden to-day. That is the essence of the fight we are waging here in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I am remembering that my doctor commanded me to speak ever so quietly and briefly to-day, and so, in the vernacular of my Indians, I say no more. [Laughter and applause.]

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF GOETHE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Goethe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, to-day marks the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. It is only fitting, at a time when the entire world is participating in a bicentennial celebration honoring our George Washington, that we recognize this great date.

It is fitting and appropriate, for a number of reasons, that we pause in our thought of George Washington to turn our attention to the great German poet, philosopher, dramatist, novelist, and scientist.

Far apart as the two men were in the fields assigned them by the great Creator, the two were alike in many respects. They were alike, first of all, in being among the very few supreme minds that humanity has produced.

No statesman was greater than Washington. No poet, not even Homer or Shakespeare, was greater than Goethe.

The great German did his work for human advancement in the peace of his study, while the great American wrought the good that he did on the field of battle or in political councils. But in essentials the two men thought alike.

One of Goethe's first dramas concerned itself with the celebrated of a great sixteenth-century champion of liberty. And in the last great work of his life, the completion of Faust, he raised the hero of that immortal work to the plane that Washington occupied throughout his life—the plane of simple wisdom and disinterested service to one's fellow men.

A survey of Goethe's contributions to human thought, an estimate of what he did for the lifting up of the human heart, is the task of scholars and critics. But the person of even limited reading knows something of Goethe's place among the immortals.

So much of human life is gathered up in his varied works—he explored so many human problems, he lighted up so many deep recesses in the human heart—that it is little wonder that critics assign him the honor of having given shape to an entire era of human culture.

Goethe is Germany's pride, as Washington is ours. And the nation which sent to Washington's aid the military genius of Von Steuben and De Kalb, and the loyalty of thousands of German-Americans in Washington's ragged army, deserves the compliment of America's tribute to its chief adornment.

Though Washington and Goethe never met, their purposes ran parallel, their efforts were alike for human good, and the two were one in their counsels of good will.

Could we honor them in any more fitting way than by putting into our everyday relations that same good will, not only among ourselves but with all other nations?

Is it not possible for surface differences between peoples to sleep, as the bodies of these two great men sleep, while the spirit of concord they voiced lives on?

I suggest that in the name of George Washington, whose last public words expressed that spirit, we Americans extend to the German people a fitting return for the honors they have tendered the memory of George Washington in this bicentennial year. [Applause.]

On March 6, under the patronage of President von Hindenburg, the German Reichstag held a celebration in honor of the George Washington Bicentennial, at which time the walls of that chamber rang with the strains of the Star-Spangled Banner.

To-day let us pause and think of their great hero—their gift to civilization—Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. [Applause.]

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill, and, pending that, I ask leave to make a short statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. My colleagues, I sense the temper of the House as well as any other Member. I repeat that I have said or done nothing to alienate the personal feelings of any Member of this House, and neither have I criticized any Member of this House. I am performing my duty as I see it, and you are doing likewise.

I do believe, my colleagues, it is to the interest of the country that this matter be speedily disposed of. I am confident that every Member of this House knows how he is going to vote and that prolonged acrimonious debate will not change a vote. I am anxious to do what I can to expedite the consideration of this bill, and I say to you that which you all know, that the House has a perfect right to do what it pleases with the bill. I am confident that the sooner the real controversial issue in the bill is disposed of the better it will be for the country and for the House.

Yesterday I talked with several friends, who are active in opposition to the manufacturers' tax, to see if we could come to some understanding whereby we might go at once to the manufacturers' tax title and dispose of it. No understanding was reached.

Acting in accordance with the Ways and Means Committee direction, I introduced a rule yesterday simply to provide that when the House again considered this bill we should take up the manufacturers' title under the general rules of the House.

Some of my friends who favored the bill as written, and some who are opposed to it, were opposed to any rule and thought it might add to the difficulties of the situation. Surely I am one of the last men in this House to do anything that might add anything to the difficulties in the speedy consideration of the bill.

This morning the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Rankin], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] did me the honor to come to my office to see if there was not some way by which we could reach an agreement to expedite the consideration of the bill.

We talked the matter over. I advised them that, of course, I could not come to any agreement with them, that I would have to confer with the Ways and Means Committee, with the Speaker, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Snell].

When the Ways and Means Committee met at 10.30 this morning, I presented the matter to them, but prior to that I had a conversation with the Speaker and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Snell].

Now, the proposed suggestion by the three gentlemen I have named, Mr. Doughton, Mr. Rankin, and Mr. LaGuardia, was this: That I should ask unanimous consent that when the bill was taken up in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, we should proceed at once to the consideration of Title II, which is the inheritance estate tax title. It was suggested that we might have two hours' debate on that, to be under the 5-minute rule, and when the two hours were up not to preclude the offering of any further amendments that anybody desired to offer. You know that under the rules of the House you can move to close debate after the five minutes on each side is up.

The suggestion was that after the vote on the inheritance estate tax title we go immediately to Title IV, the manufacturers' sales tax title; that we would have two hours' debate, and that Members were to have the right to offer preferential perfecting amendments to the first section of the bill, and then it would be in order for anyone to move to strike out the entire title.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. RANKIN. My understanding of the agreement was that we were to take up the inheritance-tax provision under the general rules of the House. Then, when that is disposed of, that we take up the sales-tax provision under the general rules of the House, just as we would if we were to come to it in the course of reading the bill, as we are now doing. I did not understand that we were to agree that anybody should have any undue right to offer any perfecting amendments.

Mr. CRISP. I do not think that is necessary under the gentleman's statement, and I agree that the matter was to be considered under the rules of the House, although I think it was understood that we were to limit the debate to two hours. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] said that he was willing to have two hours of debate, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] said that he was willing, but the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Rankin] said that he was not willing to make any limitation but suggested that we let the House make the limitation.

Mr. RANKIN. I was not then referring to the time.

Mr. CRISP. I am going to answer the other, but I wanted to clarify that. I think the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from New York will verify that statement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman tell the House from which side this suggestion comes? Who suggested the irregular order of jumping from one place in the bill to another?

Mr. CRISP. I might say both sides made the suggestion. I made the suggestion in the interest of expediting it, to do it by bringing in a rule to make the manufacturers' tax title first in order. Then this morning the suggestion was made from the other side that this unanimous-consent agreement be had, so I think I truthfully say that both sides suggested it in the interest of expediting the determination of the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is expedition the only motive that prompts this unusual arrangement? Is there any other reason the gentleman can ascribe?

Mr. CRISP. I think the foremost reason of all is that it is in the interest of our country to get this matter speedily decided. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman mean by that that the only thing now that is in sight is the matter of expedition, which might carry the suggestion that any possibility of agreement between the contending factions is gone?

Mr. CRISP. No. This agreement, if the House enters into it, does not affect the right of any Member of the House. Each Member would have a perfect right to offer germane amendments to any part of the bill, and the proposal is not to change the rules of the committee as to the consideration of bills under the 5-minute rule in the slightest degree. This agreement, if made, does not change in any way the orderly procedure of these two subject matters as to how they would be considered under the rules of the House. The estate tax, Title II, is in the bill ahead of Title IV, the manufacturers' tax, and if we just continue to read the bill as we were doing the estate tax would be reached first.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not think the gentleman caught the purport of my question.

Mr. CRISP. Let me finish this statement and then I shall yield further. Here is the advantage in this proposition as I see it: We left off reading the bill the other day on page 36. There are about 158 pages between that point in the bill and the point where we reach the estate tax. Those 153 pages are devoted to mostly noncontroverted administrative changes. They are matters that ordinarily would be read through rapidly. Unless some understanding or agreement is made in respect to reaching these controverted items it is within the power of the Members on both sides of the House to offer amendments to all of those 158 pages and delay, and it might be two or three days or a week before we would reach Title II. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What I am trying to obtain from the gentleman for my own information is this: First, is there any possibility of an agreement between the contending factions?

Mr. CRISP. None whatever.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Has the gentleman from Georgia or his committee made any effort to compose the differences?

Mr. CRISP. Members of the Committee on Ways and Means in the performance of their public duty, as they see it, brought in a bill for the House to consider. It became almost immediately apparent that there were many Members of the House who were opposed to it, bitterly opposed to it, and there is no way in the world to compromise those differences. The only thing is to have it go to the House and let the House vote, and the House vote will be decisive of the matter. We have proposed amendments to meet certain exemptions. The members of the committee did not care to bring in a manufacturers' sales tax. They did it because they believed it to be the best method to meet the emergency. Naturally, the members of that committee when they first brought in the bill exempted all farm products, certain food products, and many other articles which I shall not other amendments which we think, from the veiwpoint of those opposed to the bill, should certainly make it less objectionable to them, and the committee believes that, with those amendments adopted, $468,000,000 would still be raised by the manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. In case the gentleman's unanimous consent is refused, does the gentleman intend to pursue his request for a rule or to continue the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule as usual?

Mr. CRISP. If this request is not granted, personally I would prefer to go on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has just said that under this unanimous-consent agreement the bill would be read under the rules of the House. Then the gentleman said further that he desired to offer an amendment proposing additional exemptions. If the bill is read under the rules of the House, that means it will be read by paragraphs, does it not?

Mr. CRISP. That is the question which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] propounded to me a moment ago and I intended to answer it, but the gentleman asked me other questions and I could not answer it. Yes. The bill, under the rules of the House, is read by paragraphs. I apprehend, if this agreement is made, some gentleman opposed to the manufacturers' sales tax-I would not make it because I am for it-but I suppose some Member would perhaps move to strike out the first paragraph. Then I would offer a perfecting amendment to that first paragraph, with certain exemptions, and under the rules of the House, and under the rules of all parliamentary bodies I know of, where there is a motion made to strike out matter, a preferential motion to perfect the text is made before the vote on striking out is taken.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Assuming, of course, that the amendment is germane?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, has not the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Bankhead, already ruled that this bill is to be read by sections?

Mr. CRISP. No, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, what I want to ask the gentleman is this: What the gentleman from Georgia sought to do by his rule was to jump from page 36 in the bill over to section 4-the sales-tax section. The only thing that the other side demanded was that we first take up section 2. Is that not true?

Mr. CRISP. No. They proposed to jump from page 36 to about page 189.

Mr. BLANTON. Did they not insist that we take up section 2, which embraces the estate tax, first?

Mr. CRISP. Yes. And that is what I am asking to do. I am in no wise attempting to change.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield. Mr. BLACK. Assuming that the committee's preferential amendment is voted down, and assuming a motion to strike the first paragraph is carried, will the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be in any position then to consider substitutes?

Mr. CRISP. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would be in that position, yes; and I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is what I would hope would happen: Should the House strike out the manufacturers' sales tax title we would lose from the bill $460,000,000 if all of our amendments making exception were adopted. From our viewpoint, counting the $30,000,000 in-now enumerate. The committee has proposed a number of | crease from the two amendments that have been adopted as to the income-tax rate, the bill would still be short $460,000,000. I would call the Ways and Means Committee and ask them to recommend to you certain amendments to fill in that gap. Then any other Member of the House. of course, could offer any amendment he pleased; and, if we should make a second recommendation and the House should disapprove it, I personally would see no necessity for the bill being referred again to the Ways and Means Committee; but what I would like to see would be for the House to adopt such amendments as they see fit and pass what remains of the bill and let it go to the Senate where the Senate could offer amendments, and if the Senate amended it, then it could come back to the House for consideration of the amendments put on in the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield further? Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Would the amendment be an amendment to Title IV, that the matter concerning the sales tax be stricken out? Would there be just plain Title IV before the House, to which we could offer amendments?

Mr. CRISP. I would say to the gentleman from New York that they would not move to just strike out "Title IV." They would move to strike out the first paragraph, with notice that if that prevailed they would move to strike out each succeeding paragraph as it was reached, and then I think what I said a while ago would be true, that under the rules of the House, when another section was read and an amendment made to strike it out, a perfecting amendment would be preferential to be voted on before we vote to strike it out. This is the theory, and it is common sense, that the friends of a paragraph of legislation should be given an opportunity to perfect it before a vote is had on rejecting it entirely. It might be amended in such way that the House would not want to reject it entirely.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. In harmony with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia, it seems to me that this unanimous-consent request should be granted for the reason that this bill is largely built around the sales tax and the estate tax, and the action of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on those two provisions will tremendously influence what shall be done with the other provisions of the bill. So it seems to me the part of prudence to go first to the principal controversial question and get it out of the way. Then we will know what changes, if any, to make in the other schedules.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. I would like to have the attention of the chairman on a practical question. I note that the first section under Title IV is, of course, section 601, while the exemptions are provided for under section 602. I think there are quite a number of Members of the House whose vote upon the question of straightening out the manufacturers' sales tax may, in large part, depend upon what is done with the exemption section. Do I understand the gentleman correctly when I understand that the entire title, not only the first section but the entire title, would be perfected before the vote was put to strike out the entire

Mr. CRISP. No, sir. But I will say to the gentleman that I am going to offer an amendment to the first section which will cover what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumes consideration of the tax bill, Title II, the inheritance or estate tax, be first considered; that immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of that title the committee begin the consideration of Title IV, the manufacturers' tax title, and that under the 5-minute rule on each of those titles there be two hours' debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. I have just come back from home, and I understand there has been considerable confusion among the craft. I am wondering if during that two hours' debate the gentleman will be liberal in the disposition of time and will not allow all of the time to be taken up by members of the committee.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman says he has not been here. There were 7 days of general debate on this bill and 2 days under the 5-minute rule. There never has been such generous debate on any bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Still further reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman that I have been engaged in Red Cross work trying to relieve some suffering fishermen, and when I came back here I understood there was a mob, and I am just wondering if this consent is granted-and I always like to give consent to the gentleman from Georgiawhether there will be an opportunity given to Members to address the committee during that two hours' debate. For instance, I might want to say a word.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I change the request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that when the committee resumes consideration of this bill it proceed at once to the consideration of Title II, the estate title, under the rules of the House, and immediately upon that being concluded it begin consideration of Title IV, the manufacturers' tax title, under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that when the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumes the consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, it immediately begin the consideration of Title II and consider it under the rules governing the committee to its conclusion, and upon the conclusion of the consideration of Title II, it begin the consideration of Title IV under the rules of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object-

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order. The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection? There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to know if it will be in order when the committee amendments are offered to section 4 to offer amendments to the committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, because we are considering the bill under the general rules of the House. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Clerk will read Title II of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IT-ADDITIONAL ESTATE TAX SEC. 401, IMPOSITION OF TAX

In addition to the estate tax imposed by section 301 (a) of the revenue act of 1926, an additional tax equal to such tax is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the net estate (determined as provided in Title III of the revenue act of 1926, as amended) of every decedent dying after the enactment of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Lewis: Page 189, strike out lines 8 to 14, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

The CHAIRMAN. It is the desire of the Chair to divide equally the time for debate on this amendment between those for and against the proposed amendment, and the Chair will undertake, so far as possible, to carry out that program.

The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall make only a factual and not an argumentative statement with respect to the above amendment.

In making my statement last Thursday I explained that if the rates applicable to individual incomes under the bill were applied to inheritances, a revenue equal to $714,-000,000, greater than that realized in the proposed bill, would be reached. This statement was based on two principal factors, namely: A 40 per cent maximum rate, and that rate applied at $100,000 of income, as in the case of individual incomes.

The above amendment, however, which has just been read is not designed to raise $714,000,000 but about $481,-000,000 in addition to the revenues arising under the present law; and the difference in these yields is accounted for by the difference in the income and estate rates and in the points of application of the maximum rates.

I will here insert a comparison by percentage of the present rates on net estates and individual incomes under the bill; also the estate rates proposed in the amendment as offered by me.

Ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the above table shows discriminations in taxation probably not paralleled in the history of taxation. It was perhaps not designed and represents only the neglect of the legislative mind. I have heard no justification offered for it. The difference between the dead man's relation to the estate-" It is my capital "-and the living beneficiary's relation to it as acquisition or unearned income need not confuse us. From the point of view of a mind in the coffin, say, the earthbound spirit of the departed, it was his capital. From the point of view of the living recipients it is their income when received just as is the reward of the inventor who awakes from the dreams of the night with an invention that he sells for $100,000. The dead man's relation and point of view are clearly inapplicable. The Government owes him no duties, and he owes no duties to the Government; both have ceased to exist. New relations and new duties have taken their place. The relations of the living beneficiaries to the values coming to them-initially income for them-and the duties of Government toward them and their duties to it. There can be no property dynasties in contemplation of American law. To project the decedent's relation—"his capital"—beyond his grave and mummify if for the recipients who take the property through the instrumentality of Government is only a method of erecting dynasties of wealth as belong to the ] feudal system.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment I have offered provides an exemption of $50,000. The exemption carried in the law and in the bill is $100,000. Formerly the exemption was $50,000, I am told.

The point of application of the 40 per cent or maximum rate in the amendment just read to you is upon a net taxable estate of $500,000—not $100,000—after the allowance of an exemption of $50,000. This distinction in the application of the maximum rates at $500,000 rather than at $100,000, as in income taxes, reduces the yield about $232,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does this plan that is outlined provide for a drawback if the estate taxes are assessed by a State or by a Commonwealth?

Mr. LEWIS. The bill is unchanged in that respect. The States would continue to get what they are getting under the current law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But this is a heavier tax than any heretofore proposed?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, reading these rates means nothing until you put them into application, for they are cumulative; that is, 40 rates must be applied to ascertain the real rate; and so I shall ask your attention for just a moment while I give you some examples of these cumulative rates in application to the net estate left by a decedent.

On a net estate of $100,000 left by a decedent these rates would amount to 11/4 per cent only, a rate less than that usually levied on real estate by the local authorities.

On an estate of $150,000 net the rate comes to 3 per cent. On an estate of $200,000 the rate is about 5 per cent.

On an estate of $250,000 the rate is about 7 per cent.

On an estate of $350,000 the rate is about 11 per cent.

On an estate of $450,000 the rate is about 141/2 per cent. Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Let me finish this, please.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I just want the gentleman to accentuate whether that is stepped up or not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland may be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. I have just one more illustration and then I shall answer your question.

On an estate of $550,000 net the tax comes to 18.1

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Is that 18 per cent on the entire $500,000 or is it stepped up in each one of those places?

Mr. LEWIS. It is stepped up through the incomprehensible forms of rate statement that the draftsman finds necessary in the amendment.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. No; I am referring to what the gentleman is reading now.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me make that plain. If the decedent leaves an estate of $100,000 net, 1¼ per cent will be paid on it. That is the whole payment, and it will amount to $1,250.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And how much on an estate of $500,000?

Mr. LEWIS. Eighteen and one-tenth per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then what does the 40 per cent proposal that was read mean?

Mr. LEWIS. It means nothing until it is combined with the 39 lower rates. You have to employ 39 other rates beside this 40 per cent. This is an actuarial problem, gentlemen, which can not possibly be worked out on the floor. I think that is the reason why the American people have never had a real inheritance tax. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM and Mr. FREAR rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield first to the gentleman from Mary-

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does this tax apply to the value of the estate when the man dies or the value at the time of the distribution of the estate?

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman will please ask Judge CRISP that question.

Mr. FREAR. One of the points that is so continually urged in regard to the money that can be raised relates to the British estate tax. How does this compare with the rates at present with respect to British estates, if the gentleman can tell?

Mr. LEWIS. I would rather not go into that subject at this time; it may be necessary later. Let me say in answer to the question-

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman will permit, are these taxes in addition to the taxes under the existing law of 1926?

Mr. LEWIS. The rates quoted include the present rates. Mr. BULWINKLE. How much would that be on an estate of $500,000 with the taxes proposed by the gentleman's amendment and the taxes under existing law?

Mr. RAGON. I do not think the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] understood the gentleman's question. Will the gentleman state that question again?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Are the taxes, proposed under the gentleman's amendment in addition to the taxes imposed now under existing law?

Mr. LEWIS. The amendment rates include the present

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then may I ask what would be the combined tax under the gentleman's amendment and under the 1926 law on an estate of $500,000?

Mr. LEWIS. I can not apply on my feet the many rates of the current law, to answer you, but I can give you a datum from which you can make your own application.

The yield under the current law is $127,000,000 on aggregate taxable estates of about two and one-third billions, or about 5 per cent. The amendment yields $609,000,000, that is, an average of about 20 per cent of $3,000,000,000 of expected estates. The table I have inserted gives the average effective rates on different sizes of estates.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not true that this is the only way you can redistribute the wealth of this country?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, I would rather not go into that separate question now. The rates are designed for revenue.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What we are anxious to know is this. You have been given the figures and have been asked the question whether these figures you have read are in addition to the already existing estate tax.

Mr. LEWIS. That is correct. The rates include the present rates.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then, will the gentleman tell us what the whole tax will be under his amendment and the present

Mr. LEWIS. It is very difficult for one to solve these actuary questions for particular amounts of estates on his feet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The State drawback amounts to about 80 per cent. We adopted quite a while ago an amendment which coerced the States into passing an inheritance tax in order to keep up with the Joneses, and it amounts to about 80 per cent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask a factual question. Say a man leaves a hundred thousand dollars estate, what would he pay under both schemes, the present law and your proposed amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. He pays $1,250 under my amendment, but under the current law, and under the bill as reported, he would pay nothing.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I asked the gentleman to yield simply to make the statement that the figures set forth in the gentleman's amendment make it a simple matter to compute the actual tax for each bracket.

Mr. LEWIS. That is true at his desk.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. If I understand the gentleman, the maximum rate under the present law, when it is finally stepped up, is 20 per cent. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, after the step-up, the maximum rate, if adopted, will be 60 per cent under the law.

Mr. LEWIS. The maximum rate of 40 per cent would apply at $500,000, and at $500,000 would mean only an 18 per cent rate on the whole.

Mr. BURTNESS. If I understood the gentleman's answer to the gentleman from New York, that would be the result.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me say, first, that the tax under the present law is virtually only a tax for the benefit of the States, for 80 per cent goes back to the States. Out of the yield of $127,000,000 in 1929, $102,000,000 goes to the States. Now, it is true that, looking at the draftsman's form of the rate under the bill, a 40 per cent maximum seems to be imposed. That maximum is not reached under the present law until a $10,000,000 estate is encountered; and then amounts only to 13 per cent, whereas the income tax amounts to 46 per cent. You can see for yourselves that when only $127,000,000 is realized from some two and a half billions of dollars of estates that the present inheritance law, on an average, brings only about a 5 per cent yield on the total taxable estates. On the actual net estates it is much less.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. Mr. SNELL. As I understood the gentleman, he stated that the total amount collected at the present time, to say nothing about rebates to the States, is practically $127,000,000 a year.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. Mr. SNELL. How much will be collected under his proposed amendment, to say nothing about the rebates?

Mr. LEWIS. $609,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman is increasing it about

Mr. LEWIS. If the gentleman likes ratio discussions, he perhaps would like to hear some other ratios?

Mr. SNELL. I am asking just for information. It is not a question of what my likings are. I want to know definitely what we are doing.

Mr. LEWIS. I prefer not to argue those matters.

Mr. SNELL. I am trying only to get the facts.

Mr. LEWIS. Very well; we will give the gentleman some more facts while we are at it.

Mr. SNELL. I grant that is correct, $127,000,000, so that if I am correct on the other computation, in addition to $127,000,000, the amendment will produce $611,000,000 more.

Mr. LEWIS. The whole yield expected is about $609,000,-

Mr. SNELL. Then it will be about five times what it is at the present time.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; and I may say that in England the inheritance tax at this time is about six times what it is in the United States, including the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does any part of this $611,000,000 go back to the States?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; the same as now.

Mr. O'CONNOR. How does the gentleman expect the States will get their inheritance tax?

Mr. LEWIS. They are already receiving $102,000,000 a year under the present law, or 80 per cent.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And they will receive none of this $611,000,000?

Mr. LEWIS. They will receive the same as now.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to the section to which the gentleman offers his amendment, this supertax, the State does not get any portion of it under this bill.

Mr. LEWIS. There is no supertax involved in this amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But under the section which it attempts to supersede.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, I understand. The committee treatment of this subject is quite the same as my own.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to say that it was just $611,000,000. At the beginning of the debate I understood the gentleman to say that the proposed amendment would yield only $482,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS. Four hundred and eighty-two million dollars more than the proposal of the committee. The $127,-000,000 under the present law is to be added to this $482,000,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I did not understand the gentleman's reply to the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochranl, in which he said the gentleman's amendment would redistribute the wealth of the country. I thought the gentleman either said yes or that he did not care to argue the question. What was the gentleman's reply?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not recall, but I will answer now. In any measure of taxation, of course, two objectives are likely to be envisaged. The first one, especially in an emergency of the character through which our Treasury is passing, is the revenue objective. That is the only objective I am considering in this amendment. If a social objective were to be taken into account, a much wider and, I must add, a different kind of discussion would be invited. I have confined my effort entirely to the revenue aspect of this matter at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not this a problem of such magnitude that what the gentleman called a philosophical or social phase is entitled to be well considered; that is to say, as to whether this proposal will not cause the dissipation of fortunes and destroy the incentive to invest and set back a new country? Those things are entitled to be discussed.

Mr. FREAR. What has been the effect in England? Has it destroyed everything there?

Mr. LEWIS. I leave that question to be answered by the larger wisdom of the membership of this House.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Several times the question has been asked, What will be the total tax, both present and proposed, on an estate of $500,000?

Mr. LEWIS. I have already stated it would be about 18 per cent.

Mr. CROWTHER. The question that several Members are asking is, What is going to be the amount of the tax on an estate of $500,000 under the gentleman's proposed amendment and under the present rate?

Mr. LEWIS. Under the present law the rate is 2.5 per cent on the entire net estate.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

This tax which the gentleman proposes Mr. BOILEAU. is an addition to the existing law. Is that correct?

Mr. LEWIS. That is true. So is the tax proposed by the committee.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. As I understand, the amendment proposed by the gentleman changes the rates from what the gentleman proposed in his first amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. I offered no amendment on Thursday last, but only presented a comparison of the income and estate

Mr. ALLGOOD. So that now only half the revenue will be raised from estates?

Mr. LEWIS. About $482,000,000 and not $714,000,000. This amendment will raise something like three-fourths of the revenue that would follow the application of individual income-tax rates to this subject matter.

Mr. ALLGOOD. But the rates on the higher incomes have been reduced by the gentleman's amendment, have they not?

Mr. LEWIS. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman's proposal, where the net estate is above $500,000, is to be 40 per cent, which amount is to be paid exclusively as a superinheritance tax to the National Government. Under the existing law the rate as carried in the 1926 act on estates of $500,000, allowing $100,000 exemption, is 4 per cent in that amount between $200,000 and $400,000.

Mr. LEWIS. I can not follow your computations on my feet in these circumstances.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was attempting to aid the gentleman in support of his amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to thank the gentleman and hope he will make a statement to the House. I think his figures are about right.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman has said that this tax will raise $609,000,000 in the fiscal year 1933. Will it raise any more than that in the fiscal years 1934 and 1935? Will it increase in the coming years?

Mr. LEWIS. It will change only in proportion to the population and the general wealth of the country.

Mr. FIESINGER. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that estates may not be settled up in 1933?

Mr. LEWIS. That circumstance is always involved. It is involved in the present law.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The exemption under the present law is how much?

Mr. LEWIS. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. PARSONS. Under the present law it is $100,000?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman contemplate raising the gift-tax rates?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. When we get to that title the figures will be changed correspondingly.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman has been asked the question how much would the total tax be on $500,000?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is approximately $119,750, and on an estate of $1,000,000 it would be $349,750, approximately. Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. With respect to the different inquiries about yields under the present law, I wish to call the attention of the membership to the fact that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] made a speech on Thursday, March 17, in which he inserted those figures in the RECORD, and they will be found on pages 6342 and 6343 of the RECORD, in which the gentleman gives the present yield by various different amounts under the present law.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. Has the gentleman had the Treasury Department officials or experts make any computation as to the yield under the gentleman's proposed amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I have. The estimates given you have been made by the staff of the joint committee on internalrevenue taxation at my request. They are not responsible in any sense for the purpose of the amendment or for the rates, but they have made the computations.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman please state the amount that they assumed could be collected under this amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. I have stated it. Under this amendment $609,000,000 is estimated to be collected.

Now, perhaps the most helpful statement I can make in enabling you to weigh the importance of this levy is a statement by national comparison. The British people, as you know, are some 40,000,000 in number. They are paying 80,000,000 pounds in estate taxes, including the taxes that are imposed on the beneficiaries as well. That comes to about $10 per capita, or a gross of $400,000,000, taking the pound at $5. If we take the rate under the amendment, we should get $609,000,000 as the gross levy in the United States. with a population about three times as great and with wealth per capita supposed to exceed greatly that of the British people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five additional minutes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

Mr. RAGON. I wanted to ask that the gentleman have five additional minutes, Mr. Chairman. This is a very important matter. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland have five additional minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I am not asking for it. I would rather have an opportunity later in the discussion to meet questions asked.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand that under the rules of the House under which we are operating there are something like 30 Members of the Ways and Means Committee, and those who are not members of that committee will not be permitted to express themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am just asking if that is not the rule? The CHAIRMAN. The House is proceeding under the general rules of the House.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I thank the Chair very much for the information.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, taking advantage of the leave to extend my remarks, I wish to present some data which may aid us in reaching conclusions on this subject. The wealth of the United States, as estimated by the National Industrial Conference Board, during the past decade has been as follows:

Hous.
1920	$483, 783, 000, 000
1921	311, 730, 000, 000
1922	314, 719, 000, 000
1925	355, 678, 000, 000
1929	355, 029, 000, 000
1930	322, 735, 000, 000

It is the view of public financiers that on the average there is a total turnover of such wealth by death each 30 years, which means that each year there is a turnover of 3.33 per cent. On this basis, and taking the year of 1930, the property passing in 1930 was $10,733,000,000, while the total taxes collected from this source by both the Government and the States amounted to less than $245,563,241, or less than 21/3 per cent on the national turnover.

Official data on the subject are confined to some 8,798 returns made to the Treasury and reported in Statistics of Income of 1929 at page 46. These account for a gross estate turnover of $4,108,517,490, or 38\% per cent of the national turnover. From this gross total deductions of about $1.800.-000,000 were made, leaving $2,376,972,608 subject to taxation. about 58 per cent of the reported and but 22 per cent of the Net tax after deducting tax credit__ 39, 003, 061 The whole national turnover is taxed in Great Britain and was £466,466,978 in 1926-27, or $2,332,334,890 in our money, and about the same gross as here with three times the population. The British figure has since advanced to $2,900,000,-000. From its gross-estate turnover, less than one-third ours, the British collected about $400,000,000, or about 14 per cent as compared with 21/3 per cent here. My amendment contemplates collecting about $600,000,000, which, considering the gross turnover in the United States, comes to less than

one-half the percentage of levy prevailing in the United FORM OF RATE MISLEADING

Mr. Chairman, the form of the rate employed by the expert draftsmen of the bill and amendments and carried into the discussion defeats an intelligent understanding of the rates proposed. Some of the rate is stated in percentages and some of it in the terms of the gross tax payable. Thus, with regard to estates of $500,000, we have:

Ninety-two thousand six hundred and twenty-five dollars upon net estates of $475,000, and upon net estates in excess of $475,000 and not in excess of $500,000, 39 per cent in addition of such

One hundred and two thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars upon net estates of $500,000, and upon net estates in excess of $500,000, 40 per cent in addition of such excess.

Nearly 40 of these paragraphs are employed to express the estate tax on an estate of $10,500,000 under the law or of $500,000 under the amendment.

It is only too apparent that reading one of these tax paragraphs does not bring to the mind a correct conception of the amount of the rate. Instead a misleading impression is gotten from the partial percentage employed. You would conclude that estates of $500,000 paid 39 per cent. The actual rate is 18.1 per cent. Meanwhile the gross figure also employed fails to express a percentage at all, and the incongruities of terms and figures leaves one mystified and sends him looking for the specialist who wrote the paragraph as the only person who can surely interpret it aright. The result is that discussion in the House of these rates as found in the bill and the amendments becomes impossible.

CLARIFICATION OF RATE STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, I am proposing a clarification of this rate schedule so that it will be intelligible. I employ percentages only and propose that the following rate percentages take the place of the rate paragraphs as passed by the House:

Mr. Chairman, these are the final rates themselves, as applied to the estates of the amounts enumerated and require no interpretation. If the estate be of some amount not stated, say, of $110,000, falling in part I of the schedule, the rate will be 4 per cent, plus ten twenty-fifths of 1 per cent, or a total rate of 4.40 per cent. The tax on $110,000 would be $110,000 multiplied by 4.40, which equals $4,840.

Mr. Chairman, it may serve a useful purpose to give a comparison of the effective rates under my and the Ramseyer amendments since it is impracticable to make such a comparison by grading the amendments themselves. I may say that the computations were made by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue.

It appears, Mr. Chairman, that assuming the conditions of the basic wealth turnover of $3,131,300,000 in 1930, the yield would be:

Present law	$127, 770, 000
Ramseyer amendment	345, 708, 500
Lewis amendment	609, 124, 875

In effect the Ramseyer amendment, the assumed conditions obtaining, would increase the revenue by $217,938,500. while the Lewis amendment would increase the revenue by $481,354,875. Of the need of the greater revenue there, unhappily, is no doubt. Of the relative justice of these amendments, I shall leave that question to other judges.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the House for the exceptional indulgence it has shown me in presenting a subject so tedious in its statistical aspects.

In conclusion I am inserting data on the estate taxes levied in the United Kingdom, France, and Germany compiled by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, also the amendment on estate taxation which has been the subject of this discussion.

RATES OF AND REVENUE DERIVED FROM DEATH DUTIES IN GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND GERMANY

GREAT BRITAIN

The inheritance duties or death duties are seven in number, of which three only are payable in connection with deaths occurring at the present time, namely:

(a) The estate duty, a duty payable with reference to the passing of property on death; and LXXV-420 (b) The legacy duty and the succession duty, each of which is a duty payable with reference to the acquisition of property by beneficiaries.

1. Estate duty-scope

The estate duty is an ad valorem graduated tax leviable upon the net principal value of all property situate in Great Britain which passes upon the death of any individual.

FRANCE

Death duties are of two kinds, an inheritance tax on the net estate of the deceased (Droits de mutation par décès) and a succession or estate duty (taxe successorale). There is also levied a tax on gifts inter vivos (mutations entre vifs à titre gratuit).

1. Tax on transfers at death

The principal tax on transfers at death of real or personal property is an inheritance tax payable on the net share received by each person.

2. Succession or estate duty

In all successions in which the deceased does not leave two children, either living or represented, a progressive tax on the net total capital of the estate is due in addition to the death duties. This tax is a superimposition with the object of putting heavier charges on bequests in small families.

In contrast to the death duties, succession duty does not depend upon the degree of relationship and is not payable on the hereditary share but on successive portions of the net total capital of the succession.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important subject. It is a little difficult to speak under the 5-minute rule, and in order to have time to explain just what the situation is and to use the blackboard before us, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND). The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have been in this estate-tax fight ever since the war. I have urged increases in this form of taxation. I have never urged confiscatory rates, but I have insisted on rates that would be productive of revenue.

I never thought I would live to see the day when I would have to get up on the floor of the House and advise caution against unreasonable increases in estate tax rates. There is such a thing as going to excess on anything. If you go to excess now you get a reaction later.

I was through the fight in 1924, when we increased the estate-tax rates. The country at that time was not prepared for those increases, with the result that when the revenue bill was up in 1926 we almost lost the estate tax altogether.

To make the estate tax productive of revenue-and I want to see this source of revenue more productive than it now is—you have got to develop it gradually. The British probably have had more success with the development of estate taxes and making them productive of revenue than any other people.

Before I go further I wish to say for your information that the amendment which I offered is printed in the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD for March 12 and can be found on page 5897. I hope to proceed for a while without interruption and after that I will gladly yield for relevant questions.

The British started in on estate taxes a good while before the war. The British brackets notwithstanding many changes and increases in rates are much the same now as they were in 1894.

In 1894 their estate-tax rates ran from 1 per cent in the first bracket over the exemption to 8 per cent in the bracket of $10,000,000 and over. The next time they amended these rates was in 1907. They took the same brackets they had and increased the rates. They ran from 1 per cent to 15 per cent. In 1909 they again increased their estate-tax rates. They adopted the same brackets and they ran from 1 per cent to 15 per cent, increasing more in between. In 1914 they revised the estate taxes upward, from 1 per cent to 20 per cent. In 1919, with the same brackets, they went from 1 per cent to 40 per cent. In 1925 they again revised their estate-tax rates, retaining the same brackets, and their brackets are a good deal the same as our brackets. They increased the rates between the minimum and the maximum. In 1930—that is, two years ago—sticking to the same brackets, they increased the rate from 1 per cent to 50 per cent: that is, the maximum British rate now is 50 per cent on that part of an estate over $10,000,000. The minimum is 1 per cent. The British only have an exemption of £100, or about $500. Then they start with 1 per cent.

Now, under our existing law we have an exemption of $100,000. Under the law prior to 1926 our exemption was $50,000. In the substitute I offer I go back to the $50,000 exemption and then graduate the rates from 1 per cent on the first $10,000 over the $50,000 exemption to 45 per cent upon the net estate in excess of $10,000,000.

I want to give you a picture of how the rates run under the present law. Here is the base line [illustrating on black board] and over here you will see is $10,000,000. That is the top bracket. Our present law runs from 1 per cent to 20 per cent, and the rates run up gradually like that [indicating]. Under our income tax law our rates swing upward more and then go out horizontally.

The committee proposes to double the rates in the present bill and they start with 2 per cent. The line has a gradual upward trend. This is 20 per cent maximum and this is 40 per cent maximum carried in the bill [indicating].

The rates I propose are more along the line of the British rates; that is, there is an upward curve so as to impose a little more weight on the intermediate estates, because there is where you have the large volume of property that devolves on account of the death of the owners.

The rates I propose start with 1 per cent over $50,000 and go more in this order [indicating]. Mind you, that beginning with an exemption of $50,000 the brackets of my amendment follow very much the brackets of existing law; that is, the maximum rate of 45 per cent applies to that portion of the estate over $10,000,000.

The gentleman from Maryland proposes a schedule of rates that looks something more like this and then straight over like that [indicating]. He does not propose a gradual upward trend but a steep upward movement until he gets to $500,000, when he applies 40 per cent rate to all above that amount. That is, on a $1,000,000 estate the part over $500,000 would have a rate burden just as great as the rate burden imposed on a $25,000,000 estate; that is, 40 per cent all the way through.

I am here speaking in the interest of developing the estate tax so as to make it productive of revenue.

The rates I have adopted were written, as they were read to you, after conferring with persons who have had experience in administering the estate-tax laws. I doubt whether the gentleman from Maryland, in preparing his amendment. conferred with men experienced in administering the estate tax law. I had experts prepare the amendment I have offered. I asked them to prepare an amendment which would yield, as nearly as they could figure it, $500,000,000.

Now, let me make it clear to you that the amendment I offer does not affect the existing law. It is not put over on top of the existing law. It specifically provides that the amount the States are entitled to under existing law remains undisturbed. The rates that are in my amendment are the maximum rates that would be imposed on any estate. To figure out what the estate would have to pay, you would first figure with my rates and then to find out what a State is entitled to retain under the 80 per cent provision, you figure out what the State would be entitled to under existing law and subtract that from the amount that the tax would amount to under my amendment. So the rights of the States to a part of the estate tax under existing law will under my amendment remain undisturbed. That is, the State's participation in estate taxes is neither enlarged nor diminished but will be in the future the same as it has been since 1926.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, a member of the committee.

Mr. RAGON. As we have treated the amendment in the bill, we have treated the increase as a supertax and the States do not participate in that in any way. I do not think the gentleman has made it clear whether the States will participate in his supertax or not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They do not.

Mr. RAGON. They only participate in the tax that is levied at present.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is it exactly, and that part is not disturbed at all.

Now, let me make this clear again. I can not stop here to write all this out, but Figure 1 here [indicating on the blackboard] is a line which indicates the existing law; Figure 2 is the line or the step-up in the bill; Figure 3 is a line of the step-up under my amendment; and Figure 4 illustrates the line or step-up of the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

Each year since the war, except last year, when I did not have time to do so, I have read the report of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer. This in itself is a liberal education in public finance, and I have followed especially with interest their estate-tax law development.

In Great Britain there has been nothing radical about the development of their estate taxes; in fact, nearly every increase that has been proposed and put on has come when the Conservatives of Great Britain were in power. I am not proposing to you anything radical. I am proposing to you something that is just, I am proposing to you something whereby you can get revenue according to capacity to pay, and it is a source of possible revenue that in my opinion has barely been tapped. What I am asking you to do to-day is to take a logical step forward and, maybe, some time in the future, other steps can be taken.

Now, as to the British rates. When I prepared this amendment I did not have the British rates before me, but since the amendment has been published in the Congressional Record I have had access to the latest British rates. Of course, the British exempt only $500. We, in this amendment, exempt $50,000. The British rates run from 2 per cent to 5 per cent higher than my rates, but the British line is a good deal like this No. 3 which I have drawn on the blackboard to illustrate the rates I have proposed. The British maximum rate on that portion of the estate over $10,000,000 is 50 per cent, whereas my proposal is 45 per cent.

I think I have made plain to you just what the different proposals before the House amount to. No. 2 is what you see in the bill, No. 3 is my own amendment, and No. 4 is the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAMSEYER. For a question; yes.

Mr. RANKIN. How much will the gentleman's amendment yield over and above what the present bill would yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, remember that any increase to become productive will take probably two years.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that. I am not talking about the time, but the yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. When this becomes productive it will probably yield between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000. The committee proposal, I understand, will yield, when it becomes productive, something like $300,000,000. So the difference would be two or three hundred million dollars, and it is made on the intermediate brackets, where the burden is a little heavier than that proposed by the committee.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. For a question; yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. No. 3 represents the gentleman's amendment, is that right?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. And it resembles the British form of taxation?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. And the British form of taxation brings out £80,000,000 a year for 40,000,000 people.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I know what the gentleman is driving at.

Mr. SIROVICH. Why is it that the gentleman's plan with 120,000,000 people will only bring $500,000,000?

Mr. RAMSEYER. For this reason—the great bulk of the property that devolves is in smaller estates. If we would tax as heavily as the British do small estates, exempting only $500, we would probably get from three to four times as much revenue from this tax as the British do. The difference is in that our exemption is higher.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. There was a little confusion, and I did not get clearly this point. Do the States share under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I can assure the gentleman that under my amendment the part that the States get now will not be affected at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is to say, they will get no more.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They will continue to get just what they have been getting under existing law since 1926.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The States will get what they are getting now, and any possibility of their going further and getting more from estates will be limited as the United States rates go higher.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The United States rates are higher because of the need of the Federal Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. For a question.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has evidenced his purpose of raising the rates. May I ask the gentleman whether or not, if his amendment should be defeated, would he then support the Lewis amendment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not in favor of the Lewis amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I wanted to see if he can not go along with those who favor a raise if the committee does go along with him.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Let us take one amendment at a time.

Mr. BLANTON. I only wanted to see how far we could go with the gentleman on his proposition.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I did not yield for that question. I want to dispose of this first.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Has the gentleman had any estimate of the Treasury as to what his amendment would produce?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I have had the estimate of an expert, not connected with the Treasury, that it will yield at least $500.000.000.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. But the gentleman has not asked the Treasury for an estimate?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; I have not.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The amount of this tax must be collected in cash. But suppose an estate has no cash, that its assets are in business, and so forth. What length of time does the gentleman give for the payment of the tax?

Mr. RAMSEYER. My amendment would not affect the administrative provisions of the law. I always have been in favor myself of liberal administrative provisions, to give the estates plenty of time to settle up so they will not be hurried or crowded in settling up at a loss.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Ought there not be some provision for that in the bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. That comes later on.
Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUFF. There has been considerable confusion around here, and I did not get all the responses of the gentleman to the questions propounded to him. The committee bill will raise a certain amount of money.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand something like $250,-000,000 or $300,000,000.

Mr. WOODRUFF. And how much additional will the gentleman's proposition raise?

Mr. RAMSEYER. About $200,000,000 or $300,000,000

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes. Mr. CAVICCHIA. Some States levy a tax as high as 14 per cent, which is in addition to the gentleman's amend-

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly. That is taken care of under existing law. This does not in one iota affect the present relationship between the States and the Federal Govern-

Mr. CAVICCHIA. That was not my question. Some of the States collect plus 14 per cent maximum-

Mr. RAMSEYER. And that 14 per cent is deducted under the provisions of existing law. The provisions of existing law are not changed by my proposition for increasing the rates.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. My question is, Has the gentleman considered the addition of his tax to the 14 plus per cent tax now paid in certain States under existing law?

Mr. RAMSEYER. My dear sir, seven or eight years ago I made an exhaustive study of the inheritance tax laws of every State, and if the gentleman had been here-

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I am sorry to say I was not here. Mr. RAMSEYER. He would have heard me speak on State inheritance tax laws. I have studied State laws; yes.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. And your conclusion is that with the tax you are proposing now and the tax now paid to the States it is less than the English tax?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, certainly; no question about that.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman propose to offer an amendment to the gift-tax section?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No. The gift tax should be lower than the estate tax. Heretofore I have always stood for a gift tax. I thought it was a mistake in 1924 to put the gift-tax rates as high as in the estate-tax rates. There is such a thing as going too high on gift-tax rates, thereby rendering them unproductive. The same rule applies to income taxes. You can not, by merely writing high rates on incomes, collect a lot of money. That is, you will reach the point of diminishing returns. With estate taxes it is different; the law of diminishing returns does not apply. It is a matter of judgment. We do not want excessive rates, but we want reasonable rates, productive of large revenue.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman knows that in a dissenting opinion in the Supreme Court yesterday it cited millions of dollars that have escaped us through the gift tax.

Mr. RAMSEYER. We have a gift tax in this bill, and I am for it. The only question the gentleman raised was whether I proposed to offer an amendment to increase the gift tax, and I answered that I did not.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to say in answer to what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown] said that the Supreme Court merely decided that the provision of law that gifts made within two years of death were presumed to be made in contemplation of death is unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has decided that Congress can pass a gift tax to take effect from the date of the passage and not be retroactive. That decision yesterday in no way affected the validity of the gift tax as set out in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes. Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What is the minimum amount not subject to tax under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Fifty thousand dollars net.

Mr. McGUGIN. If I understand the gentleman's amendment correctly, it is an additional and further tax to the tax now in existence under the revenue act of 1926.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is an increase of that tax, but the rates of my amendment are not superimposed on existing rates.

Mr. McGUGIN. Under the tax as it now exists, the rate runs from 1 per cent to 20.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman's rate does not increase the maximum at the top from 45 to 65 or at the bottom.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No.

Mr. HAWLEY. In any bracket of the gentleman's proposal, the amount he states is the total tax to be paid.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Up to that bracket; yes.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I am in sympathy with the amendment you have proposed. You have indicated an interest in the administrative features of the present law relating to the collection of estate taxes so that the manner of such collection would not work an undue hardship or loss. Has the committee, in increasing the rates, taken that into consideration in this bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. There has been no change in the administrative provisions.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Just for one question.

Mr. SIROVICH. I think the whole House is interested in one matter which the gentleman can explain, and that is the difference between the gentleman's amendment which is No. 3, and Mr. Lewis's, which is No. 4. They both show that you can raise $500,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If enough people die.

Mr. SIROVICH. But the difference between the gentleman's amendment and the Lewis amendment is that between $50,000 and $500,000 the gentleman's proposal is more gradual, while his is a greater jump.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not know where the gentleman from Maryland got his figures. I submitted my rates to experts, and they estimated about $500,000,000 annually would be collected.

Mr. SIROVICH. He says the same with his.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I think he said $600,000,000 additional. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I submit the following table of rates, which are self-explanatory:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I asked that this blackboard be left in the well of the House for a moment in order that I might call attention to something that is quite accidental. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Ramseyer] brought in this blackboard in order to make a diagram which shows four different methods of taking wealth away from the deceased.

The gentleman happened to bring in a board which had on it these pictures, which were used by the distinguished Member from Florida [Mrs. Owens] to show the beauties of the proposed Everglades National Park, which, by the way, will be a charge, sooner or later, on the Federal Government. See the pictures. They have served her purpose. Now they will serve ours. See the beautiful fernlike trees. See the pretty birds, flying against the hazy blue sky. Why, these seem to be pictures of Elysium; almost a portrayal of Utopia, and the perfect state where there shall be no taxes, no riches, aye, no government—the ultimate outlined in all of the socialist textbooks, from those of Marx and Engels down to Henry George, but mostly in Marx's heavy volumes-Das Kapital. While I can not hope to outline to you Karl Marx's theories as they have been developed to fruition, and are now being carried on in many European countries, if you will read this book, the Terror of Europe, written this year, you will understand what I am driving at.

Mr. KELLER. Written by whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. By H. Hessell Tiltman, author of J. Ramsay MacDonald, and other volumes, and written from facts, not theories, and not filled with guesses or predictions, you will get the last word about Stalin, Russia's "Man of Steel," the communist dictator of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. And about Italy, Hungary, Yugoslavia, the Polish Ukraine, the little "Liberia" in Italy, the forced labor camps of northern Russia, and so on. You will get the communistic trend, and the death and destruction of its wake.

I have not the time to tell you, but I can make the suggestion that, as far as I can see, the best thing that the Members of this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in consideration of this tax bill can do at this time will be to vote for the Ramseyer substitute for the Lewis amendment, on the ground that the Ramseyer substitute is less socialistic.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In just a moment.

Then you will have a chance, if you so vote, to fall in behind your Ways and Means Committee of 25 Members, who have labored hard in good faith, under extreme difficulties, to bring out a bill that will raise some revenue. If we are going to follow mere dreams, let us all be dead sure that we know what we are doing and where we are going.

I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LEWIS. I have never been conscious, in discussions in this House, passionate though the discussions sometimes began, of throwing an epitaph-

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not an epitaph, but an epithet.

Mr. LEWIS. At any other Member of this House, such as the gentleman has just thrown at me, and I want to let the gentleman from California-

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not California, but Washington.

Mr. LEWIS. To let the gentleman from Washington now

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us be fair about it. Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman wait until I am through?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, really, I can not wait. I am making this particular speech. It is my time.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, the regular

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. LEWIS. I want to let the gentleman from Washington know that perhaps he has failed to draw my size in this discussion and has only exposed his own.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, I said I believed that one amendment proposed as a substitute for this amendment was less socialistic than the other. If that is an epitaph or an epithet (laughter) it seems to have stung and cut deep. [Applause.] I am reminded, as a matter of fact, that proposal No. 4, on this blackboard diagram, the proposal of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] is an epitaph as to the possibility of much of an estate tax by any of the sovereign Commonwealths of this Union. [Applause.] Did not Mrs. Malaprop say something about "a nice disarrangement of epitaphs "?

What I want to say is this: Are we looking solely for revenue upon bases which are fundamentally sound, from the standpoint of economics, or are we indirectly and insidiously trying to thrust a form of social legislation on the people in the guise of taxation. Let us be honest with ourselves and with the Nation.

You will notice that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]—and I admire his talent and industry—said in his speech, while he was presenting his amendment, he preferred not to discuss the social features, the phychological features. I am trying to call attention to the fact that those features are here and are dangerous, and should be dis-

Are we insidiously trying to thrust a form of social legislation on the people in the guise of taxation? That is the question, and do not forget it. We are offered several plans of increased graduated taxes upon those who are fortunate enough to be rich when they die. We are trying to do all this in Committee of the Whole. Not five men can stand up here now and say what the various proposals really are, as indicated on the blackboard by the first straight line, the first hypotenuse, and this last, the double jumper. [Laughter and applause.] The Treasury of the United States needs money and needs it now, and the rich who die are taxed double in the bill of the Ways and Means Committee. But it is proposed to tax the dead rich four, five, or six times on top of the committee's 50 per cent increase, and some of you will want the rich to die now to fill the Treasury, or, perhaps, give 30 days' notice and then die, to be stripped to the shroud. [Laughter.]

No, Members, this is not a matter for laughter. It is most serious.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limit on the time.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have been talking over on the Democratic side, and now, Mr. Chairman, I shall step across the aisle and speak to my Republican brethren. Speaking on the question of inheritance taxes before the National Tax Association in Washington on February 19, 1925, Mr. Coolidge, then President of the United State, said-you see, this thing has been brewing for a long time:

If we are to adopt socialism it should be presented to the people of this country as socialism and not under the guise of a law to collect revenue. The people are quite able to determine for themselves the desirability of a particular public policy and do not ask to have such policies forced upon them by indirection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Is the gentleman against all inheritance taxes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not, of course. But inheritance taxes can be laid with reason. The bill as reported doubles the inheritance tax. There are some who would lift taxes into a straight-out capital tax; that is, so that as taxes are paid the principal is eaten into and finally it is gone. No county commissioner from away back would do that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Washington yield again?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the gentleman to let me proceed. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any further. There are a great many western men here. live, prosper, and develop on borrowed money. If we tax estates beyond a certain point, we will create a desire on the part of those who have accumulated large sums of money to dissipate those sums before they die. They quit investing; and if they do that, we dissipate the chances for development.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask whether or not the gentleman from Washington is for the committee bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am, with the amendments as to manufacturers' tax on canned foods and the cheaper clothing and shoes.

Mr. BLANTON. Everyone who is for the committee bill as it is written is naturally against the raising of taxes on estates and against us who are fighting against the sales tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no. The gentleman is not stating my position correctly or treating me fairly. It so happens I was one of the first to lead in the movement to lift the tax on canned fruit, canned vegetables, canned fish, and canned meats. But I did not have to help tear the bill to pieces in order to get that relief. There are other ways to win than by raring, bucking broncho insurgency.

However, I am not concerned or alarmed about all of this excitement, about all this hubbub over this tax bill, for

I am satisfied that even the bill as written, even with the amendments adopted the other day, and the other amendments to be proposed and adopted, will not even then raise sufficient revenue. We are tearing an extreme tax bill all to pieces. Great revenue does not drop into the Treasury when we in Congress say "Great revenue, drop into the Treasury now, instanter." No. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, in response to eight specific inquiries propounded by me. He tells how the debt is increasing.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman said he had a letter from Ogden Mills, who favors this sales tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not yield, please. This bill, with all the high-sounding brackets the House has shot into it, will not anywhere raise the revenue. The other legislative body will hold hearings on this bill for weeks, debate it for still other weeks, amend it, and it will be worse.

Mr. Chairman, after we have stricken out the manufacturer's tax, voted down the proposed beer tax, elevated all income taxes, and raised estate taxes we will come back here some day all too soon and find it necessary to raise more revenue in some of the very ways we are now throwing into the waste basket.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a letter of mine written a month ago, containing eight questions asked of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have his reply. My time has about expired. In addition to extending my own remarks. I ask unanimous consent to print these letters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to incorporate as a part of his remarks the documents referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the Ramseyer substitute were adopted would the gentleman be in favor of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will vote for anything that will get anywhere near the necessary revenue in a reasonable way, and I will go along with the trained and experienced members of the Ways and Means Committee who have acted with nerve, with dignity, and with reason.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the gentlemanfrom Washington whether or not his people back home are in favor of the sales tax?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They favor a balanced Budget. They want the credit of the Government maintained; they want its sovereignty maintained, its defense kept up, and business from top to bottom given an ordinary chance, so that the wheels may go round, pay rolls resume, commodity prices come up, and normal living be restored.

They do not want sovietism or a dictatorship or too much government. Oh, if I had but five minutes more to speak, I could tell the gentleman that back in the offing and behind this insurrection in the House is the desire, not to raise money by taking it from the rich as taxes, but a desire to actually take away the property of the rich. Socialism. and then some! I ask you to study this, think about it, and 10 years from to-day, if you live, please read this Congres-SIONAL RECORD as to this day's proceedings. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Ogden L. Mills, requesting information on 'several questions which were propounded as follows:

- 1. Estimate deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932?
- What was the Treasury deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931?
- 3. How was that deficit cared for?
  4. If bonds were issued then, in what amount and under what provisions of law?
  5. How long do those bonds run and at what rate of interest?
- 6. What, if anything, is there in the Treasury to the credit of the soldiers' bonus?
  7. What amount will be necessary to pay the remaining portion - of the soldiers' bonus in full?

several explanatory tables inclosed. His letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Washington, March 18, 1932.

My Dear Congressman: I acknowledge receipt of your letter requesting information concerning the deficit for the fiscal years 1931 and 1932, and also information concerning the soldiers' bonus. There is transmitted herewith a copy of the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1931, in which your attention is called to the statement appearing on pages 25 and 26. You will note that the deficit for the fiscal year 1931 amounted to more than $902,000,000, and that the deficit for the fiscal year 1932 has been estimated at over $2,122,000,000. This last-mentioned figure does not include any funds required on account of legislation passed since the publication of the Budget in December, such as payments on account of subscriptions to the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal land banks, which may amount to $625,000,000. In addition, a recent revision of estimates for internal revenue and customs receipts shows a decline of $117,000,000 from the estimates submitted in the Budget, which will have the effect of further increasing the deficit by that amount.

The deficit for the fiscal year 1931 was cared for entirely by borrowing, as will also be the case during the fiscal year 1932. It is not possible to state what particular issues of Government securities are for the purpose of covering the deficit in receipts. The Treasury generally bases its borrowings on its estimated needs for a three months' period and through these borrowings the deficit is automatically taken care of.

During the fiscal year 1931 the Treasury, in addition to its short-term borrowings, issued on March 16, 1931, $594,230,050 face amount of 3% per cent Treasury bonds of 1941–1943. On June 15, 1931, there was an issue of 3 per cent Treasury bonds of 1946–1949, aggregating in face amount $821,406,000, and on September 15, 1931 (fiscal year 1932), there was an issue of 3 per cent Treasury bonds of 1951–1955 in the aggregate face amount of tember 15, 1931.

423,000. No further issues of bonds have been made since September 15, 1931.

In this connection there is transmitted herewith a copy of the statement of the public debt of the United States for December 31, 1931, from which you can readily ascertain the dates and amounts of the issues of securities during the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 which are still outstanding. There is also inclosed a copy of the Daily Statement of the United States Treasury for February 29, 1932, in which, on page 4, you will find a preliminary statement of the public debt for that date. The 3½ per cent Series A-1932 certificates of indebtedness maturing August 1, 1932, in the amount of $227,631,000 and the 3¾ per cent Series A-1933 certificates maturing February 1, 1933, in the amount of $144,372,000, have been issued since the statement of December 31, 1931. All of these obligations have been issued under authority of the Libery bond acts, as amended.

You will note from the preliminary statement of the public debt shown on the Daily Statement of the United States Treasury for February 29, 1932, that there are in the adjusted-service certificate fund 4 per cent obligations in the amount of $167,200,000. As the Veterans' Administration needs funds with which to make loans to veterans or to pay death benefits, these obligations are redeemed by the United States Treasury and the funds placed to the credit of the Veterans' Administration. This is the only fund in the Treasury held for account of the adjusted-compensation certificates.

Un to February 29, 1932, there has been approximately $900.

certificates.

Up to February 29, 1932, there has been approximately $900,-000,000 loaned out of this fund to the veterans under authority of the act of February 27, 1931, which liberalized the loan provisions of the adjusted-compensation certificates. This sum does not include loans made from the Government life-insurance fund. In this connection there are transmitted herewith statements showing certain information regarding loans to veterans on ac-count of the adjusted-service certificates.

count of the adjusted-service certificates.

The Veterans' Administration is in a position to furnish you accurate figures on the amount required to pay the remaining portion of the soldiers' bonus in full, but the Treasury is glad to furnish for your information the following estimated round figures. As stated above, there has already been loaned to the Acterans approximately $900,000,000 of the adjusted service certificate fund, and there is available in the fund at this time the sum of $167,200,000, making a total of over $1,067,000,000 made available by Congress for the adjusted service certificate fund. It has been estimated that the face value of the adjusted-service certificates outstanding amounts to approximately $3,500,000,000. certificates outstanding amounts to approximately $3,500,000,000. Deducting the above-mentioned funds which have already been made available and eliminating for the purpose of this computation the accrued interest on loans that have been made and are now outstanding leaves approximately $2,400,000,000, which would be required in appropriations to pay the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates in full.

Very truly yours, OGDEN L. MILLS, Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. Albert Johnson,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Inasmuch as the statement of the condition of the United States Treasury is issued daily in circular form, I have not inserted one of these, but desire to call attention to the fact that all daily statements as to the receipts since March 15 from income-tax returns show a very heavy drop as compared with last year's receipts, compared day by day. The deficit is increasing.

tax, and you will have to reach here, there, and everywhere for taxes, many of which will be excise taxes, which will have to be taken "right on the nose" by the purchaser as he buys, and you will hear from it everywhere you turn. I do not object to high income taxes or high profit taxes, but I do think that a mistake can be made in levying such taxes too high-that is, if you really desire to raise the enormous sum of tax money needed to even approximately balance the Budget.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I am not conceited enough to arrogate to myself the ability to change the views of any man in this House on this amendment. However, I would be recreant to my duty as I understand it if I did not present a few thoughts to you in connection with these amendments.

The amendment of my friend from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] applies income-tax rates to accumulated estates.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. No; I will not.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman is in error in that state-

Mr. CRISP. I will not yield. The gentleman applies graduated income-tax rates to estates over $50,000. Now, what is the effect of that, gentlemen? It is treating the accumulation of years as income for one year. The graduated income-tax rate is based on your net earnings for one year while estate taxes are based on your life's accumulations. You may by your industry and frugality have saved during a long life $100,000, $200,000, or $300,000 to leave to your wife and children. It is not net income for one year. Those rates apply to your life's accumulation. I am, of course, against that amendment. [Applause.]

The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa increases the rates recommended by the committee, and I understand that my friend from Iowa claims his amendment will raise about $200,000,000 in a full year more than the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment recommended by the committee doubles the estate tax and attaches the maximum of 40 per cent to estates in excess of $10,000,000.

It is estimated by the Treasury Department that the committee's amendment in a full year will raise $150,000,000. The Treasury Department advises me that the estimates that my friend from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] has were made by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and were based on business values in 1930. Of course, the value to-day of stocks, bonds, and all other property is much lower than it was in 1930, and therefore I do not believe his estimate is actually correct, although it was furnished to my friend. I am simply pointing out this difference. The Treasury estimates were based on values in 1925.

May I read you what Thomas Jefferson said?-

To take from one because it is thought that his own industry and that of his fathers has acquired too much, in order to others who or whose fathers have not exercised equal industry and skill, is to violate arbitrarily the first principle of association, "the guaranty to every one of a free exercise of his industry and the fruits acquired by it."

[Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. No; I do not yield now.

I can add nothing to what I have said. Oh, gentlemen, I have no wealth, neither have I a brief for the wealthy class, but I do say that wealth is what enables factories, industries, railroads, and others to operate and to furnish employment to many of our good citizens.

I hope both the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland and the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be rejected, and that the rates proposed by the committee doubling the estate tax will be agreed to.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, of course the specific purpose of this bill is to raise sufficient revenue to balance the Budget. Other subject matter has been introduced that is undoubtedly extraneous, but revenue is its prime objective.

I think on a serious matter of this kind we ought to apply the ordinary rules of common sense. In the surtax rates we applied rates that we thought dangerously approached the point of diminishing returns.

It is not inconceivable that the general public and those who have money and who are in business, with the vision before them of extortionate rates of this kind, when their estate is finally liquidated will see to it that there is not so much increment to be divided among their relatives at the time of death, and they will endeavor to distribute it in some other way.

There is only one material advantage that I see in the Lewis amendment, and that is it would be a constant urge to everybody in the United States that has accumulated a fortune to keep on living and not to die. [Laughter and applause.] You had better stay here under that kind of a rate and enjoy it for a while.

The distinguished leader, Mr. RAINEY, said the other day that after 20 years of research in tax matters he had discovered the answer with regard to raising money is that you are to get the most feathers with the least squawking of the goose. Here is a case where the goose can not squawk-it is dead-and, of course, it is considered an easy method of securing the money. There is nobody to find any fault. The goose or gander, whichever it may be, can not squawk any longer. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has just made one of his characteristic appeals here on behalf of the toiling masses and the burdens of the toiling masses of the country, and let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi that he and the rest of the Members of this House know that the toiling masses of this country have just as much common sense, just as much patriotism, just as much loyalty as he has, and they are just as willing, in an emergency, to subscribe their share of an equitable tax as any of the rest of the population of the country. [Applause.] You do not get very far with these constant appeals in behalf of the toiling masses. They do not want these demagogic appeals made in their behalf. I remember a few years ago when we had this estate tax before us, Chairman Green, of Iowa, espoused this tax. It was the only proposition on which the chairman, Mr. Green, and the distinguished Speaker of this House, Mr. GARNER, were in accord 100 per cent. They were both strong for the estate tax. But just look at the rates they had at that time. Why, I said a few moments ago to the former chairman of the committee, Judge Green, "You were a mild-mannered hold-up man with the rates you advocated at that time, as compared with Captain Kidd and his band of pirates who appear here to-day under the leadership of the gentleman from Maryland." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas for five minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. Under the rules, the proponent is allowed five minutes in favor of a proposition and the opposition five minutes against the

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kansas desires to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not know that.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McGugin as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Ramsever]: Strike out the first five brackets of subsection (b) and section 2.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment which I have offered to the Ramseyer amendment simply says that the inheritance-tax rate as provided by his amendment will begin with an estate of $100,000, rather than $10,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

gentleman seek?

Mr. McGUGIN. I understand the gentleman's amendment begins at $10,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, no; paragraph (c) the exemption is $50,000.

Mr. McGUGIN. Then why, if you are going to exempt ten, twenty, thirty thousand dollar estates, why have these estates absorbed by an exemption?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The $10,000 is above the exemption.

Mr. McGUGIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, in that event, I will ask to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to rise in favor of the Ramseyer amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the time has been exhausted under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is familiar with the rule, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I object.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York and calls his attention to the fact that the last word is $50,000. [Laughter.]
Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope the membership will not be too technical in holding me to the $50,000 when we are discussing estates of $100,000,000

All this talk about the confiscation of property and about the destruction of wealth, I want to say in all kindness, has been just a bit overdone. I submit that any proposition which is contained in the Ramseyer amendment, which provides for a tax of 45 per cent on estates of over $10,000,-000, is certainly not sufficient justification to wave the flag and denounce its proponents as radicals. [Applause.] I refuse to admit that only legislation which creates special privileges is constructive. There has been too much special privilege in the past. Since when are Members to be classified as constructive and patriotic only when they sponsor legislation beneficial to large fortunes?

After all, the right of inheritance is a right given by the State, and without that right there would be no inheritance.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LaGUARDIA. No; I do not yield.

Now, let me give you a few instances in the last two years of large estates, taken at random from press reports. I cite these cases only to indicate the size of the fortunes and estates and in no way to reflect on the decedents. They were all no doubt well thought of in their respective communities. Thomas B. Slick died August 17, 1930, leaving an estate of $75,000,000. Dr. J. T. Dorrance, of the Campbell Soup Co., died September 21, 1930, leaving an estate estimated at $200,000,000. W. P. Foss, of the New York Trap Rock Corporation, died September 21, 1930, leaving an estate of $30,000,000. Daniel Guggenheim died September 29, 1930, estate not yet estimated, but it is reported that it will run in eight, if not nine, figures. Ella von E. Wendel, died March 15, 1931, estate of $100,000,000, with no known heirs or next of kin living, though it seems thousands of next of kin are now scrambling for the estate. George F. Baker. died May 2, 1931, estate of $75,000,000. Rodman Wanamaker, died within a year and a half, estate of $41,790,544. Payne Whitney, died May 25, 1931, estate of $239,301,017. E. H. Gary, died August 13, 1931, estate of $22,579,521. W. M. Wright, died August 28, 1931, estate of $60,000,000. Samuel Mather, died October 19, 1931, estate of $50,000,000. Abraham Erlanger, died March 7, 1930, estate of $75,000,000. Edward Bok, died January 9, 1931, estate of $23,718,981. Some of those who have died whose estates have not yet

Mr. RAMSEYER. How much of an exemption does the been estimated, are Colonel Friedsam, head of B. Altman & Co., died April 8, 1931, estate of over $50,000,000; Isaac Gimbel, who died April 12, and others. These are taken at random, from all sections of the country.

There is no feeling between the adherents of the Lewis amendment and the adherents of the Ramseyer amendment. These two gentlemen worked out the two propositions, two plans for an inheritance tax, and the difference is very slight. Under the Lewis plan the maximum rate is reached at $500,000, while under the Ramseyer plan the maximum is reached at $10,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS. And that is what it is now under the present

Mr. LaGUARDIA. No; there is a very material increase as the discussion on the subject has already indicated. Both the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] are entitled to the thanks of their colleagues for their work and labor on this subject and have made a distinct contribution to this bill. The increase in the inheritance-tax rate is in keeping with our program to eliminate the sales tax provision and with the policy not only to raise needed revenue but to establish social legislation which will eventually prevent the concentration of wealth of the Nation into the hands of a few families. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the LaGuardia amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not yield to a feeling natural under the circumstances. I thought I had presented this subject dispassionately and endeavored to present the actuarial features involved in it. The difference between the Ramseyer amendment and that which I propose is fundamental. The maximum rate of 40 per cent is reached at $500,000 in the case of my amendment but is not reached until the $10,000,000 point in the case of the Ramseyer amendment. This is the trouble with the present law; it is the trouble with the proposal of the committee; the maximum rate is so long deferred that the great body of the estates is passed by before a rate of taxation is reached that will give us revenue. Let me call attention to a few facts here that ought to prove decisive. Do you realize, you representatives of 120,000,000 people, that the amount of estates taxed in the United States at this time is about two and one-half billion dollars, while it is $2,900,000,000 in Great Britain, with one-third of our population.

What does that mean? That about two-thirds of the estates of decedents in the United States entirely escape under the present statute the application of any rates at all.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. LEWIS. I do not. This is a question not of a social purpose but with me one of being just to the United States Treasury in the moment of its greatest need. I asked Mr. RAMSEYER to yield that I might learn the yield under his amendment, but he declined. The yield I have given to you is the yield estimated by men of a staff competent to make these calculations, and it shows that we will have $355,000,000 more revenue under the amendment I propose than we would have under the proposal of the committee. It would take the place, substantially speaking, of the present sales-tax schedule. Mr. Ramseyer's amendment in its yield is indefinite. Both our income-tax rates and our inheritance-tax rates have been written from two points of view-antimillionairism with regard to the rates at the top and a disposition to coddle the middle classes with low rates at the bottom. Listen to a report, made under the direction of Congress, on our income-tax rates as compared with the British rates. On $4,000 net in the United States, as compared with the rate in Great Britain, the British payment under the present law is fifty-eight and a half times as great as the American payment. On $7,000 the British payment is twenty-one times the American payment. On $10,000 it is 14 to 1; on $20,000, 61/2 to 1; on $30,000, 5 to 1; on $80,000, 21/2 to 1; and $100,000, 21/4 to 1. The current law on inheritance and income taxes in the United States might just as well be entitled "Laws to exempt the middle classes of the United States from their just burdens of taxation."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for enough time to finish a concrete illustration.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words of the Ramseyer amendment. I have the honor and privilege of belonging to the Captain Kidd Lewis group, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Crow-THER] referred. I consider it one of the finest privileges that has come to me since I have been a Member of Congress.

I listened to my distinguished colleague from Georgia quote from Thomas Jefferson. That is the first quotation I ever heard the gentleman read, or the first statement I ever heard the gentleman make which I was really surprised at, coming from the intellect of the gentleman from Georgia, for whom I have a real admiration and respect. If we followed out the principles now as set out in the document which he read-I repeat, if we follow it out to its logical conclusion today—then the gentleman from Georgia is telling us that the man who is so unfortunate in his birth that he is obliged to go into a factory and merely has the opportunity of earning a daily low wage, striking at one nut or fixing one part of a machine, through no fault of his own, not being born with a silver spoon in his mouth and not being given the opportunity of a college education, we should not tax the son of any of the big multimillionaires of the United States to prevent privation and want in the families of those who did not have the advantage of being born rich. That man's children, when he goes to work, must go hungry. They must starve for fear we might interfere with the vested interests of the multimillionaires of the United States. We who favor these amendments have been termed communists, reds, and

I am not a socialist, but I never worry about being called a socialist, because I have found out that every time you attack the vested interests of the country the smoke screen is put out that you are a red, you are a bolshevist, you are an anarchist. That is done to keep from the people the truth of what is really being done to labor. I noticed by the headlines in the papers throughout the country that the House was in a terrible turmoil and disorder last Saturday. It is always in turmoil and disorder in the headlines when it begins to take money from the pockets of the rich.

Mr. ABERNETHY. We are a mob.

Mr. CONNERY. We are a mob whenever we attempt to put up the surtaxes on the rich. But when we cut down taxes under the Mellon plan and when we reduce their taxes the story goes out in great head lines that the House proceeded in a very orderly and gentlemanly manner to-day to help save the fortunes of the rich in the United States.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. CRISP. I know the gentleman has as kindly a feeling for me as I have for him. Is not that one of the greatest things in our beloved country that every man works out his own status in life; and is it not true that many of the millionaires, many of the intellectual leaders of the Nation, many of the Members of this House never went to college, were not born with silver spoons in their mouths, but worked out their own standing in their community and accumulated what they have? [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. That is absolutely true. But I will ask the gentleman to tell me how many millionaires there are in this House of Representatives? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. I am unable to answer, but I can assure the gentleman that I am not in that class.

Mr. CONNERY. And I will tell the gentleman that I am below him in that class. [Applause.]

Now, I have no desire further to take up the time of the House, except to say that I am in favor of the Lewis amendment and I am happy at the opportunity to be in that Captain Kidd Lewis class and vote for the Lewis amendment to tax huge estates and use that money for the common good of the people.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I see if we can come to some understanding as to the closing of debate on these amendments?

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on the pending amendments close in 15 minutes. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] wishes five minutes, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] five minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman mean the substitute?

Mr. CRISP. The two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and the Ramseyer substitute close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express a particular thought which has been running through my mind during the past two or three days. A few days ago the gentleman from Maryland talked much about special privilege. He was "agin it." But to-day he, with many others, seems to believe thoroughly in special penalties. It seems to me highly inconsistent to favor patent special penalties and protest supposed or apparent special privileges. If either one is worse than the other, special penalties should be more condemned than special privileges created through an attempt to protect industry by means of a tariff

In the last tax bill we recognized the rights of the States in the field of inheritance taxes and credited them with 80 per cent. Has not the committee gone far enough to satisfy everybody when it doubles the last tax imposed and "takes it all," giving the States no portion of this additional

In this form of taxation there is a lack of comity among the States. Certain ones take a portion of a nonresident's tax if the property of the corporation of which he may own shares is located in whole or in part within that State. Nonresidents are taxed in various ways under inheritance laws, and executors find it most difficult to obtain releases and settle such various claims in order to make final distribution. The advice is given us, "Die in your own State; have all your securities in a safe deposit box in that State; have all your securities in corporations organized in that State, and see to it that such corporations own property located only in the same State or else your executor will have to pay as well the various and complicated taxes levied by other States."

We know these conditions. The States have inheritance tax laws of various rates and in various forms which must be satisfied. I repeat that having doubled the amount of this tax and given nothing of the extra amount to the States, we have gone far enough.

It is not within our rights to assail special privileges when we are now so enthusiastic about imposing special penalties on both individuals and classes. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, all of this talk about the confiscation of wealth and all such, in my judgment, is to drag a red herring across the trail. I feel this is a great day in the history of our country and a lot will be determined as to how we act here to-day. And I believe that if I understand the temper of this House, we will act in the interest of America by raising these inheritance and estate tax rates.

When some Members of Congress propose to levy a sales tax, which will add a burden on the poverty and necessities of our country, I feel that certainly there can be no objection to a proposal to levy a 45 per cent tax on estates of

ing it socialism

In my judgment, the Ramseyer amendment and the Lewis amendment do not go far enough. Why should you levy the same rate of inheritance tax on estates of $500,000 as you do on estates of $100,000,000, as some of these estates are? I think we should have an amendment to the amendment raising that levy when we get into the higher brackets and not stop at $500,000. The Ramseyer amendment stops at $10,000,000. Why should we stop at $10,000,000 and leave the same rate on estates of $200,000,000 or nearly a half billion dollars as we have on an estate of $10,000,000?

My friends, it seems to me that to-day we might refer back to the time of old Joshua, when his forces were mustered on the plains of Jordan to assail the walls of Jericho. I feel that we here to-day will show that we are in favor of a tax system which will help America to come more and more into her own for equal opportunities, as was intended by the Constitution.

A great many Members of this House have taken the floor and spoken about the great concentration of wealth in this country. I am one who believes the concentration of wealth and abuse of wealth have caused some of the evils which we face to-day.

There is only one way to get at these great estates and this great wealth. We can not take it away from them and divide it among our people. We do not stand for that, but stand for a system which will remedy the situation. We can remedy these things by taxation. Taxation has two purposes. One is to raise revenue, and we propose to raise revenue under this bill.

I do not see how anyone can object to raising the rates on these great estates, especially when it is proposed to levy a toll or tax of $15 or $25 annually on the necessities of life, which would fall heavily on people who are earning only $1,000 a year. The fact is, that people in my section earn much less than that, the farmers and the laboring men, have almost no income; it has nearly reached the vanishing point, and I for one do not propose to make that burden heavier by adding the weight of this iniquitious sales tax to the people I represent or the people of this country. They say it is easily collected. Sure, for the people will not have high-priced lawyers to try to find loopholes and resist. They are patriotic and will pay, but I shall resist for them to the last the levying of such a tax. Many are walking the streets without work, and yet it is proposed to tax the shoes they must wear and the other things they must buy. I dissent, gentlemen of the Congress, and say the levy we propose here is not near the burden it would be if we put on this sales tax.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I have had many Members ask me the time in which estates may be settled. The law is one year and six months added without interest, and the commissioner, upon a showing of hardship, can extend that period for three more years. That makes four and a half years all

Mr. PATTERSON. I thank the gentleman for that contribution.

Now, members of the committee, the second reason: Apportion the tax where it has to be levied, as it does in all civilized countries, so as to make those most able to pay bear the burden of taxation. This in effect is a social purpose, and its aim in a country with large concentrated wealth, as we have here, is to prevent the further concentration and give the great masses who have now only a small amount of the wealth an opportunity to acquire an income sufficient to have a home and rear a family. Mr. Chairman, I believe every American who works and does his duty and supports the Constitution and the laws and makes his contribution as an American citizen has the right to a home, and to rear a family and prepare them for life and its responsibilities. I do not believe any Member of this House will take the posi-

$10,000,000 and over and that certainly is no excuse for call- | tion that with the large concentration of wealth, as has been outlined in previous speeches by a number of gentlemen of this House, it is not getting more and more difficult to do this.

In view of this fact I for one stand unqualifiedly now, as I have in the past, to remedy this system as best we may under the laws and Constitution of our great country. So I support a higher estate tax than that recommended by the committee, believing that this is one way of helping bring that about.

I believe we are all agreed that more in wages and income among the great masses of people is needed in this country to increase the purchasing power of our people who are in need. Talk about improving business, what it needs. This will do that. And will anyone question the fact that a sound tax system will contribute to cause these men to put more in wages and thereby make a social contribution to our country? True, this blessing, wealth, is to promote industry and pay wages, which will help men build homes and support families. And, I believe that the right kind of taxes will cause that to be done. I have therefore supported these increases on higher incomes and estates.

Then, finally, will anyone take the position that most of these great estates which have been built up were not accelerated by concessions in many instances given by governments? In all instances they have had protection, and in a great many instances gifts and concessions worth millions; and then, too, I wonder if there are any here who remember the thievery practiced in the old days by selling stock for public-utility developments and then the freeze out, and such like. Then the large pressure on legislatures and city governments-many of these concessions have helped build up these great fortunes. And then, too, as the estates become larger they get international concessions and demand the Army and Navy to defend them. I doubt not there are in our country to-day certain great companies which, if the truth were known, have cost our Government almost as much as 50 per cent of their great estates to defend and protect them in their ruthless methods.

Mr. Chairman, for these reasons and others which time will not permit giving at this time I hope that we will not only adopt these amendments but will, as I say, not stop the graduation of this tax at this figure but will graduate it to correspond on through the very high brackets.

I stand foursquare for principles which will promote labor and develop industry and the resources of our country and preserve the people's right in these things and dispense these blessings to all of our people, and thereby giving better opportunities to our farmers, laborers, professional and business people, to the end that we may remedy the evils which face this country and bring about prosperity and relief for the great masses of our people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, reference has been made to the estate tax in Great Britain. Great Britain has no local estate taxes such as we have in the States of the United States. There is only one estate tax on an estate in that country while we have two. Taking into consideration the fact that rates are imposed on lower brackets in that country than in ours, our estate tax, as a whole, bears about as heavily upon the estates of this country as the English rates do on estates in England. On the whole our estate taxes are comparable with those in England. But whether our estate taxes aggregate less than those in another country is not the question. What we are to decide is how great a burden should we place. I think it is agreed that England would be better off if they could lower their estate taxes.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I failed to say this: The highest estate tax this country has ever had and collected was 25 per cent in the act of 1924, when there was a rate of 40 per cent. In 1926 that was repealed and made retroactive to 25 per cent. So this country has never had an estate tax of over 25 per cent, while this bill, as reported, makes it 40 per cent.

Mr. RAMSEYER. We had a rate of 40 per cent in 1924.

Mr. CRISP. It was repealed in 1926; it was made retroactive and no taxes were collected higher than 25 per cent.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They were collected but refunded.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think this deserves the attention of the committee: When a man dies his estate immediately becomes frozen assets. The courts, on the one hand, control the action of the administrator or executor; the Federal Government controls his actions to determine the amount of the estate for Federal tax purposes and the State government for State tax purposes. So the estates are tied up in a most unmanageable way, which operates to depreciate the value of the estate, in the first instance.

Immediately upon the death of a decedent the tax liens attach upon the value it has at that time. The fluctuations that may occur later have no effect upon the amount of money to be paid, and this tax lien upon the estate of both the State and the Federal Governments is a burden upon the estate. Estate taxes interfere with the normal operations of business concerns, large and small.

The committee proposes in the bill to levy a reasonable amount of tax upon the transfers from the decedent to those to whom the estate is to be distributed.

I accord to every man the same freedom of opinion as I claim for myself, but there is no justification for an attempt to divide up the estates of this country by means of taxation at this time. We need now, more than ever in the recent history of this country, capital that can be readily availed of in the hands of people who know how to use it to make products, to employ labor, and to reinstate the industries of this country; and not to tie up continually, as men die, great amounts of wealth and place upon such amounts a burden that is not payable in kind, because if the property is in acres of land worth, say, $100 an acre and there is no sale for the land, the Government and the State demand "money, money, money "-not acres of land, not their proportion of the estate in kind.

This demand for payment of estate taxes in money can not be avoided, but we can be reasonable in the public demand as to the amount to be taken for public uses. An estate tax is a capital levy. The accumulations which have created an estate have paid the various income taxes to the Federal Government, and State and local taxes, unless it consists of tax-exempt securities. The estate tax is a supertax. While there are some very large estates, the generality of them are of more moderate amounts. The sudden demand for a considerable portion of an estate is an embarrassment that at least can not benefit the businesses in which they are included. If the tax be unreasonably large, it may do serious harm. This is not the time to add a further complication to the business of the country. The rates proposed by the committee are as high, in our judgment, as it is advisable to go, and this conclusion was reached after due consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Ramseyer substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Patterson: Just preceding paragraph (c) in the Ramseyer amendment insert the following: "$7,116,000 upon net estates of $20,000,000, and upon net estates in excess of $20,000,000, in addition, 50 per cent of such excess."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LaGuardia) there were-ayes 204, noes 45.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were-ayes 156, noes 123.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Crisp and Mr. Ramseyer.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 190, noes 149.

So the amendment as amended by the substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill for amendment at page 189, line 15.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary in-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. LaGUARDIA. It is my understanding that under the consent granted by the House we were to read the inheritance-tax provision, take a vote on any amendment which may be offered, and after that vote we were to proceed with the manufacturers' tax. As I heard the reading of the Clerk, he continues to read on the estate tax. The purpose, as the gentleman from Georgia will recall, was to get the sentiment of the House on the estate tax and let the administrative features and the gift-tax provision go until we disposed of the other matters.

Mr. CRISP. I would say to my friend that that was the understanding, but there are only two or three short sections in connection with the estate tax and I thought we might read them. I want to say to the gentleman that the chief of the drafting division tells me the adoption of the amendment might necessitate one or two little amendments in these other sections to carry out the effect of the amendment just adopted, and I will ask the drafting division to prepare those amendments making effective exactly what the committee has just done by adopting the Ramseyer amendment, and we can refer to that later and offer such amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 402. CREDITS AGAINST TAX

(a) The credit provided in section 301 (c) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended (80 per cent credit), shall not be allowed in respect of such additional tax.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike cut the last three words and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. PETTENGILL and Mr. O'CONNOR objected.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I can say what I have to say in five minutes. In the first place, I came here 10 years ago, and have followed the Democratic leadership of this House in most instances. I have been almost ultraconservative. I am one of the few Members who do not believe it is necessary to have a tax bill of $2,000,000,000 to be paid for in two years. I am a Member who does not believe that it is necessary to balance the Budget at this time by such a burden upon the backs and stomachs of the poor when there is so much suffering in this country. I believe in that old doctrine, "God have mercy on the rich, for the poor can beg." [Laughter.]

Now, the House refuses to follow its leadership, and I understand it is a revolt. I came from the country where my ancestors fought in the Revolutionary War. One of my ancestors was in the Provincial Congress of North Carolina. I am not a communist. I am not a bolshevist. I represent the third North Carolina district in Congress, and I am going to be renominated, possibly without opposition. [Laughter and applause.]

I expect to come back. I am not saying what will happen to some of you who vote for this bill. I had the assurance of the leadership of the House that salaries would not be cut. But no set of men can drive me anywhere. I am a $10,000 a year man. [Applause.] When I came to Congress I was making $20,000 a year practicing law. [Applause.] Some of you fellows who are hollering and who want to cut salaries may be worth less in your communities than you are receiving now, but I am worth more because I represent the soul of the people. We do not want Congress to be a rich man's club. When it becomes so, privilege will rule in the land.

This bill will never pass in its present form. It was never intended to pass. It now looks as if we are going to break up in a row. If we do, the Secretary of the Treasury is going to issue short-term notes to take care of the deficit made by the Republicans until December, and God have mercy on

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out subdivision (a).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 189, strike out all of lines 16, 17, and 18.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment not as a mere pro forma amendment, but I should like to have the serious attention of the committee. As I understand the situation now, the Ramseyer amendment will raise the amount of Federal inheritance taxes by about $500,-000,000 in addition to existing taxes. Under the provision of subdivision (a) none of that huge additional tax will be credited on account of estate taxes paid to the States. That presents a very serious situation. It was not so serious under the old tax law, where there was $137,000,000 collected by the Federal Government, of which the States received about

Under the Ramseyer amendment, however, this is what you are doing. You are further invading the inheritancetax field that belongs primarily to the States. The National Government first invaded that field very reluctantly and should not further intrude on the rights of the States. The States also have to raise money to conduct their govern-

In many States of the Union the inheritance taxes have been raised this year and probably will be further increased. When you put this additional burden of half a billion dollars on estates, no part of which goes to the States, you are depriving the States of any possibility of raising money through their inheritance taxes. You are preventing the States from raising revenue in a field which we used to believe belonged exclusively to the States.

I was surprised, in the first place, when the committee in doubling the Federal estate tax did not allow credit for State taxes paid. But that was not so fatal, because the amount of the additional tax was not so large; $150,000,000, I believe. Now, however, you have increased the additional tax to $500,000,000 and still deny any credit on those halfbillion dollars of taxes paid to the States. I repeat, it presents a very serious situation.

Let me appeal to those Members on my side who still hold some loyalty and allegiance to the doctrine of State rights. If they are Democrats they surely will not take all of the revenue from the States and put it into the Federal Treasury in Washington. It must be that any Democrat who still believes even a little bit in the doctrine of State rights will vote to strike out this provision now that the Ramsever amendment has been adopted. Robbing the dead for the benefit of the Federal Government was never a doctrine of the Democratic Party. That ghoulish policy better becomes the Republican Party.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] will not prevail. Congress is now endeavoring to raise revenue for the Federal Government to meet the deficit in the Treasury. Our Government is dual in character. We have sovereign States and the United States Government. It is regrettable that there is an overlapping of taxes as between the States and the Federal Government. Either the State government or the Federal Government has a right to levy these taxes, and there is a good deal of duplication. For instance, the United States Government has levied a tax on tobacco for many, many years, and now many of the States are also levying taxes on tobacco. When it was proposed to tax gasoline-and a 1-cent a gallon tax on gasoline will raise $165,000,000-it was stated that that was the province of the States, that the States were getting a large part of their revenue in that way. The States levy ad valorem taxes on land and property, and the Federal Government does not. I recognize there is some force in the statement of the gentleman from New York, but the object of this bill is to provide revenue for the Federal Government, and the bill does provide that these supertaxes it proposes to collect are not to be prorated back to the States but are all to be re-our souls as to what will happen after that, I can not tell. | tained in the Treasury. The amendment of the gentleman from New York, if adopted, would have the effect of permitting the States to participate in this additional revenue. up to 80 per cent, provided they had an inheritance tax law.

> Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman state whether or not if the committee had contemplated such a huge increase in the estate tax, it would not have considered some part of it going back to the States. I do not say 80 per cent of

Mr. CRISP. I can not answer that question because the committee never thought they were going to have these high

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does not that change the situation along the line I suggest? I do not contend necessarily for 80 per cent, but does not the gentleman think in fairness that some of it should go to the States?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so. I think the States have the power to levy as high income and inheritance taxes as they desire.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They can not go beyond 100 per cent, and if the Federal Government goes up very high we can only get the difference in the States.

Mr. CRISP. We go up to 45 per cent on estates over $10,000,000.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think the full committee did consider the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York, but we considered that the money was so urgently needed by the Federal Government that we should not permit the rebate to the States and, besides, the States would get very little under the present alignment.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The purpose of this amendment is to raise revenue to meet the deficit. That is the chief object in making this levy on estates higher than the taxes proposed by the bill as it came from the committee. It is to meet this deficit, so as to relieve certain other lines of taxation which I presume from the vote of the committee will be taken when we meet the next section. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] made a statement that I think might be a little misleading when he said that levying these higher taxes and removing the 80 per cent clause would deprive the State of certain revenues. As I understand the application, it is that there is not a reimbursement from the Federal Government to the State, but that there is a credit to the taxpayer to the amount the estate levies up to 80 per cent. There might be some argument upon the basis of double taxation, but there is no argument upon the basis that the State will lose the taxes levied under the estate tax law.

As I see it, these gigantic fortunes are not made within the boundary lines of any State. They are national and international in character and in their accumulation. The Federal Government is attempting not only to balance the Budget, but it is attempting, in levying this kind of a tax, to dissipate to a large extent these gigantic fortunes, and that, as I take it, is one of the future problems of our country. Since these fortunes are so large and are accumulated from the four corners of our Nation, then, regardless of what the State does as to property within its confines, it is the duty of the Federal Government to levy a proper tax under those circumstances against this wealth that is national in character, so as to meet the deficit now confronting us.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman

Mr. BLANTON. I move to amend the O'Connor amendment by striking out all of the O'Connor amendment except the first word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Blanton: Page 189, line 16, strike out all of the O'Connor amendment except the first word.

The CHAIRMAN. The first word is the word "The."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the portion I want to strike out is all of the amendment except its first word, to all of which I want to address my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Con-NOR1 would ask the Government of the United States to refrain from collecting a tax on estates in order that, forsooth. New York State can raise all the revenue it wants from estates as a first item of consideration. Is not such proposal a little selfish?

Practically all of the municipal bonds of my State are owned by citizens of New York. Bonds for building jails, courthouses, and schoolhouses are owned by citizens of New York, most of them. Bond for street improvements are mostly owned by citizens of New York. Bonds for drainage and irrigation purposes in my State are mostly owned by citizens of New York, and now the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor] wants the exclusive privilege of taxing those estates so that New York State, for instance, can pay its governor a salary of $25,000 a year, so it can pay its Supreme Court judges, if you please, salaries of $22,500 a year, much larger than the judges in any other State, so that the mayor of the gentleman's city of New York can have by law a salary granted him of $40,000 a year-

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, not just now; I will in a

Is it not a little selfish to so contend when the great State of New York, within whose boundaries live citizens who own the wealth that comes from all of our States, should ask that the Federal Government step aside so that the State may have a monopoly on taxing most of the big estates in the Nation?

Now I yield to my friend.

Mr. BOYLAN. I would like to say to my friend that he is in error when he states that these bonds are owned by citizens of the State of New York. Let me say to the gentleman, if he wants to build a jail or a new waterworks, what does he do-

Mr. BLANTON. I do not yield further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOYLAN. He goes to the bankers of the State of Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further.

Mr. BOYLAN. And they sell his bonds to people all over the United States, and not to the citizens of the State of New York.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further to the gentleman. That is the reason I like my friend, the gentleman from New York, because he is going to do what he wants to do, regardless. [Laughter.]

They do own those bonds. There are citizens in my State, county judges and bankers, coming up here on their way to New York all the time to sell these bonds; and they do sell them in New York. They are owned there, and the men who die there leave them to their estates and they do not have to pay income taxes on them because they are tax exempt during life, and not until death can the Federal Government get any revenue from them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I have only a few

They do not have to pay income taxes on them because these are tax exempt, and that is the reason they find a ready market for them. There are billions of dollars of such tax-exempt securities owned by the multimillionaires of the country. Did not a very distinguished gentleman-I will not mention the position he holds, but he lives in Michigan-by accident come into the possession of a great fortune? Did he not tell it publicly himself that he has invested nearly $100,000,000 in tax-exempt securities and pays nothing in the way of income tax on that to the Government at all? Talk about going to foreign countries with the wealth: those men who take their wealth to foreign countries are the very first persons in the world who want Congress to send battleships to China to protect their business there and take a chance on involving this country in war to protect them. They are the first ones to holler for the protection of our flag. Every time there is an opportunity to reach these tremendous estates, I am getting tired of seeing every kind of reason and excuse given for Congress not going after them and making them pay their just proportion of the expense of Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

Mr. Chairman, we hear a lot here about New York. Many people hate New York because they think all the money in the world is in New York. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] takes the floor and says, "Oh, they own all of our bonds. They own our jails, our waterworks, our electriclight companies. They own everything." But do we? Now, you Members are too intelligent to be carried away with a ridiculous statement of that kind. You know the facts. If the city of the gentleman from Texas wants to build a new waterworks or a new power plant or new sewers or any other public improvement, they go to the bankers of New York to sell their bonds, and they are glad to go to New York to get the money, to get their bonds sold. Who buys those bonds? Those bonds are not bought by residents of New York, except by a very small percentage. Why? Some people have the idea throughout the country that we in New York do nothing but go to night clubs at night or take cruises here and there or nowhere. We do not have the time or the money to do that. So, the bankers take those bonds and sell them to the small banks throughout the entire country.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. In a moment I will. They sell them to every little bank and to the citizens of communities throughout our land. You Members know that we would not have sufficient money in New York to buy all these bonds if the money had to come from the State of New York alone. We would have to be as wealthy as Crœsus in order to absorb them, but the money comes from your town, from the North, from the East, the South, and the West. The money comes from all these places to purchase these bonds, and yet we have men coming here and parading up and down this floor saying, "Oh, the great wealth is in the State of New York; let us soak them. They have all the wealth of the country." As a matter of fact, what happens? The bond houses in New York purchase the bonds with your money and the money of every little bank in the entire United States.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.
Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is aware, of course, that New York has been glad to loan the money to Texas, if no other States will, and the residents of New York did not feel so badly about including those bonds in their estates, but if the defaults in Texas keep on I think Texas will have to look to some other city to get its money. [Applause and

Mr. BOYLAN. That possibility might happen.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The securities of the different municipalities of the State of Texas are so good and there are so many financiers anxious to get them that we could sell them elsewhere than in New York: but I do not admit that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has authority to speak for all the bond buyers of New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. Why do you not sell them elsewhere, then, and not come to New York? [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen, we have got to be calm and conservative. Let us figure what we are going to do. Do not get the idea in your heads that when you are soaking the rich you are soaking New York. We pay 70 per cent of the entire expenses of this Government, and we ought to have greater consideration than we now receive here.

When this proposed amendment was brought in by the committee they figured, as I understand it, on a yield of about $150,000,000. It was all right under the circumstances for the entire amount to go to the Federal Government; but now when you have adopted an amendment that will bring in about $500,000,000, even by dividing it in half and only giving the States 50 per cent, you would get $100,000,000 more than you anticipated originally. So why should not the States get a part of this increased revenue? There is no legitimate reason why they should not.

I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is fair, reasonable, and just, and that it should prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

I sincerely trust that the committee will not seriously consider adopting the O'Connor amendment. It would not only undo what we have just done, but it would also take away some of the revenue that would have been raised by the original bill.

I agree with the statement that these men of large fortunes have their wealth-gathering enterprises scattered all over the United States and that we all contribute to the building of their fortunes.

But I want to assure the gentleman from New York that we have no prejudice against that great State. I am very fond of every Member from New York, including my distinguished friend, Director Crowther, the amiable gentleman from Schenectady.

Why should I have any prejudice against New York? The next President of the United States is coming from the State of New York, Governor Roosevelt. [Applause.]

But this is a matter of raising revenue to balance the Budget of the United States Government, and I certainly trust this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment was pro forma, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York to strike out subsection (a) of section 402.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read down to and including line 9 on page 190. The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the committee will now consider Title IV of the bill.

The Clerk will read the first paragraph of Title IV. The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IV-MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX SEC. 601. IMPOSITION OF TAX

(a) In addition to any other tax or duty imposed by law, there shall be imposed a tax of 21/4 per cent of the sale price (except as provided in subsection (d)) on the sale of every article sold in the United States by the manufacturer or producer thereof, if licensed or required to be licensed under this title, except in the case of—

(1) Sales by a licensed manufacturer to another licensed manufacturer of articles for further manufacture;

(2) Sales by a licensed manufacturer to a registered dealer of articles for further manufacture to be resold to a licensed manufacture.

facturer

(3) Sales by a licensed manufacturer to any person of articles for further manufacture to be resold to a licensed manufacturer, but only if such articles are delivered by the first licensed manufacturer to the second licensed manufacturer;

(4) Sales for exportation;
(5) Sales to a State or political subdivision thereof, or any agency thereof, of articles for use solely in the exercise of a governmental function; or
(6) Sales of articles hereinafter specifically exempted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CRISP: On page 225, after line 13, insert the following new paragraphs:

"(1) Sales of food for human consumption (including those (1) Sales of food for human consumption (including those grades and forms of articles chiefly used as food for human consumption in the form in which sold or after processing or as material for such food; but not including any article enumerated in subsection (d)).

"(2) Sales of wearing apparel for any part of the body.
"(3) Sales of agricultural implements and machinery.
"(4) Sales of medicines.

"(4) Sales of medicines.
"(5) Sales of insecticides, fungicides, and herbicides, if chiefly used for agricultural purposes.
"(6) Sales of malt sirup, in containers containing not less than 50 pounds each, to a baker for use in the making of bread."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not germane to the section now before the committee for consideration. The section under consideration provides generally a tax on the sale price of articles sold in the United States by the manufacturers or producers thereof. The exceptions provided in this section refer to the class of manufacturers and not to articles. The exemptions of articles from this tax will be found on page 229, section 602. The section is titled "exempt arti-, cles." It provides that:

No tax under this title shall be imposed on the sale or importation of the following articles:

(1) Farm or garden products produced in the United States;

(2) Fertilizers and such grades of articles as are used chiefly for fertilizers, or chiefly as ingredients in the manufacture of fertilizers;

(3) Garden or field seeds;
(4) Bran and shorts and feeds for animals or fowls;
(5) Meat, fish (including shell fish), and poultry, fresh, dried, frozen, chilled, salted, or in brine.

There are 24 exemptions of articles.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the orderly method of legislating is not to permit nongermane amendments for the purpose of parliamentary advantage, but to proceed with the consideration of a bill in an orderly manner. All exempt articles should be in one section. The exceptions, I repeat, that are mentioned in section 601 are the classes of manufacturers and not the exemptions to articles or commodities not taxed. In other words exceptions of classes of manufacturers are in section 606, while exemptions of articles are in section 601. The gentleman from Georgia, who has forgotten more parliamentary law than I ever will know, and what little I might know about it I think I have learned from the gentleman from Georgia, certainly can not seriously argue that under the bill as it is now drawn, with the provisions for the imposition of tax under 601 and a separate section (602) entirely for exempted articles, that his amendment at this place is germane to this section.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair desire to hear from me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Georgia briefly.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, this section says that "a manufacturers' sales tax shall be levied except," and it goes on and gives five or six exceptions where the tax shall not apply. This amendment simply adds other matters to which the tax shall not apply, and to save my life I can not see how anyone can argue that this is not germane.

Now, my friend from New York argues that there is another place in the bill where there are exemptions. This may be true. It may be better to have them all together, but from a parliamentary standpoint you do not have to do that. You can have them at two or three places in the bill if you desire if they are germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to the fact that we are not proceeding in order? A member of the committee desired to submit a point of order and was denied recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Missouri he did not know that any member of the committee desired to make a point of order, otherwise he would certainly have recognized him. Was the gentleman from North Carolina on his feet seeking recognition to make a point of order?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I was, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I say this in order to clear up the situation? I have conferred with my friend from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton]. It was my purpose when the section was read to offer the amendment, and then my friend from North Carolina was on his feet expecting to move to strike out the paragraph, with notice that if that motion prevailed, he would move to strike out all succeeding paragraphs. I was then going to move that the committee rise and leave these matters pending for consideration by the committee to-morrow or Thursday. Some of my friends say they think the Members need a rest and that I myself need a rest, in particular, and suggested not taking up the bill Wednesday, so I shall not ask to dispense with Calendar Wednesday but will let it go over until Thursday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to reiterate that if he had known that any member of the committee desired to make a point of order, in accordance with custom he certainly would have recognized him. The Chair regrets, if the gentleman from North Carolina desired recognition, he did not see the gentleman on his feet at the time.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from North Carolina was on his feet asking recognition for the purpose of submitting a question of order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be permitted to make the point of order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to give way to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to make the point of order?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; I do not, inasmuch as the point has been made. It was my purpose to make the point of order, but the gentleman from New York was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, Title IV of the bill contains a number of sections, each providing for a different division of the subject matter under the title. Section 601, imposition of the tax; section 602, exempt articles; section 603, tax on sales by registered dealers; section 604, sale price; and so on. The pending section, which is section 601, imposes a sales tax with provisions intended to prevent the manufacturer from passing it on. Section 602 relates exclusively to exemptions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia proposes to amend the pending section by inserting exemptions. In other words, his amendment would be germane to section 602 but is not germane to section 601.

It has been an established principle of parliamentary law from time immemorial that where there are a number of paragraphs relating to a particular subject, matter which is germane to one of them can not be offered to any of the others, but must be offered to the particular paragraph to which it is germane.

If the gentleman desires to add to the number of exemptions, he should offer his amendment to section 602, which deals with exemptions. They are germane to that section and they are not germane to any other section of the bill.

Let me cite decisions on this point by some of the most eminent parliamentarians who have presided over the Committee of the Whole. There are a great many of them, Mr. Chairman, but I shall take the time of the House to read only one or two.

On March 10, 1902, the Committee of the Whole was considering H. R. 11728 when Mr. George W. Smith, of Illinois, offered an amendment to a specific paragraph in the bill, and Mr. CLAUDE A. SWANSON, of Virginia, made the point of order that it was not germane to that particular paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman citing?

Mr. CANNON. I am citing section 5818 of Hinds' Precedents, holding that an amendment must be germane to the particular paragraph to which it is offered.

Mr. Frederick H. Gillett, later Speaker of the House, was presiding as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole and made this decision:

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that inasmuch as the bill is now being considered by paragraphs—

And that is true of this bill-and inasmuch as the amendment offered by the gentleman is expressly covered by paragraph 4 and other paragraphs of the bill-

Just as the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia is covered by section 602 of the pending bill-

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CANNON. Gladly.

Mr. CRISP. If the Chair will look at page 226, line 5, of the paragraph now before the committee, the language is "sales of articles hereinafter specifically exempted," the tax shall not apply. It is in the same paragraph and why can you not add other articles in this same paragraph to be exempted?

Mr. CANNON. For the very reason, Mr. Chairman, that the reference cited by the gentleman specifically relegates all exempted articles to section 602. When you turn to the list of articles "hereinafter specifically exempted" you find they are under section 602 and not under the section the gentleman seeks to amend.

As held by the Chairman, in this decision they are germane only to the section which covers them, and that section is section 602. And the gentleman can not amend section 602 until it is reached in the reading of the bill. Here is the authority. Speaker Gillett continued:

Inasmuch as the amendment offered by the gentleman is expressly covered by paragraph 4 toward the close of the bill this amendment is germane to that paragraph and not to the paragraph now under consideration.

Just as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia is germane to section 602 and not to the paragraph now under consideration.

Again, Mr. Chairman, on March 25, 1904, section 5820 of Hinds' Precedents, a point of order was made against an amendment germane to another paragraph of the bill than that to which proposed.

Chairman Boutell, of Illinois, held:

If an amendment is more appropriate to one paragraph than to another, it is not to be considered germane to the paragraph to which it is less appropriate. Therefore the point of order is Certainly no one will contend that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia is not more appropriate to section 602 than it is to the pending section.

Mr. Chairman, I could cite many more precedents, but the House is impatient. The law of the House on this point has been settled for more than a century. Amendments must be germane not only to the bill but to the paragraph to which offered. The gentleman's amendment is germane to section 602 and is not in order at this time.

It may be contended, under the familiar rule of amending a general subject by a subject of the same class, that the exemptions proposed by the gentleman from Georgia are admissible with the exceptions under the pending paragraph. That theory is wholly untenable. They are not of the same class. Read them. These exceptions relate to methods of sale and not to lists of exemptions. In the language of Chairman Boutell the exemptions proposed by the amendment are "more appropriate" to section 602, listing all exemptions made by the bill. And they are "less appropriate" to section 601, to which the gentleman has offered them.

Therefore we submit on the authority cited that the amendment is not germane and is not in order at this time, and can not be offered until the section of the bill dealing with exemptions is reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia, acting chairman of the committee, offers an amendment, which has been reported at the Clerk's desk. On page 225, after line 13, he proposes to insert the following new paragraph.

This bill is being considered by major paragraphs under agreement of the committee. This major paragraph (a) on page 225, extends down to and including the words through line 6 on page 226. The place at which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] offers this amendment follows the following language:

On the sale of every article sold in the United States by the manufacturer or producer thereof, if licensed or required to be licensed under this title, except in the case of—

Then the section enumerates six different exceptions from the general provisions of the bill. The Chair, of course, has very great respect for the parliamentary wisdom and experience of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon], who argues in favor of the point of order, but in the opinion of the Chair this amendment clearly comes within the general proposition that a general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class, and as the Chair sees the purpose and intent of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, it merely enlarges the exceptions which are provided in this major paragraph (a) of the bill. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is germane at this point, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LaGuardia) there were-ayes 227, noes 21.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, we have had some understanding between the different gentlemen interested on both sides of this question. As I understand it, when this amendment was offered, then the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] was to move to strike out the paragraph. Then I was going to move that the committee rise. If the gentleman from North Carolina does not care to offer his amendment, I shall move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. I could not offer it until I had received recog-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Doughton: Page 225, strike out paragraph (a), beginning with line 8, on page 225, down to and including line 6, on page 226.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from North Carolina should give notice that if his amendment be adopted, then he will move to strike out all of the succeeding paragraphs except that relating to foreign oil, and that notice ought to be given now.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course, I shall.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from North Carolina says that he does not care to debate the amendment at the present time. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia withhold that motion so that I can offer an amendment and have it pending? It is an amendment to the committee amendment, and I desire to have it pending. It will be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to have an amendment read for information?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; I offer the amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A motion has been made by the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out certain parts. That is preferential. No other motion can be made in the present status of affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary situation is this: The gentleman from Georgia stated that the committee under agreement was about ready to rise. Pending that, the gentleman from North Carolina offered an amendment which has been reported. Thereupon the gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment to the committee amendment. The point of order of the gentleman from Wisconsin is overruled.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARLAN. If there are any additional amendments to be offered from the floor, assuming that the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee is adopted, will additional amendments be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. All proposed amendments should be offered to the committee and disposed of in order, as proposed.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I also have an amendment, and I am wondering if it can be offered and remain as pending after the one is disposed

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is that the Clerk report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Lehlbach: Amend the committee amendment by adding at the conclusion thereof:

"Merchant vessels constructed in American shippards under the provisions of the merchant marine acts of 1920 and 1928, as amended, and all material, equipment, and furnishings therefor, for which the Government has agreed to loan more than 50 per cent of the cost" cent of the cost."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to give notice that if my amendment is adopted I shall then move to strike out the succeeding paragraphs of the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary in-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the present legislative situation. with the gentleman from Georgia offering one amendment, the gentleman from North Carolina offering a motion to strike out, and the gentleman from New Jersey offering an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, when will we vote on the motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the last matter to be considered under the present parliamentary situation.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The offer is out of order. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I wish to offer and have it lay on the desk until Thursday. I ask unanimous consent that it be read by the Clerk, so that the House will know what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN] asks unanimous consent that there may be reported an amendment, which he sends to the desk, for the information of the House.

Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would like to couple with that a short amendment-

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen]?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, with the understanding that a point of order is considered with reference to it, I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is offered only for information.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Cullen: Page 228, after line 19, insert a new Amendment by Mr. Cullen: Page 228, after line 19, insert a new paragraph, No. 2-A:

"That there shall be levied and collected on all nonintoxicating beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other similar nonintoxicating fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight brewed or manufactured and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States by whatever name such liquors may be called a tax at the rate of 3 cents per pint, such article to be bottled at the brewery: Provided, That no such article shall contain more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, and provided further that the manufacture and transportation of such articles shall be conducted under permits to be issued in accordance with the national prohibition act and under such regulations, including assessment and collection of the tax, as shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States: And provided further, That no such article shall be permitted to be transported into any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, the laws of which forbid the manufacture or sale thereof." facture or sale thereof."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if I may now offer an amendment to be read for the information of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can do it by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman submit that request?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I send to the desk be read for the information of the House and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Chair if he will entertain a unanimous-consent request that I be permitted to address the House for three minutes to defend the character of Senator James Couzens, who was attacked here this afternoon, in that it was charged he had made a large fortune by accident, and that Mr. Couzens had said he had "invested $100,000,000 in tax-exempt bonds," the inference being that Mr. Couzens had done so to escape his rightful share of taxation?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to address the House for three minutes, out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, such defense would violate the rules of the House, and I object.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Bachmann) there were ayes 208 and noes 6.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RAMSPECK (at the request of Mr. TARVER), for the remainder of the week, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I want to give notice that I will not call up this bill to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, but will call it up Thursday.

"THE KING CAN DO NO WRONG"

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, for a quarter of a century in most of the States, and since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment in the Nation, the prohibition question has been the paramount issue in the politics of those States and the Nation. Not that this question has been the most important one for consideration, but, rather, that it has been pushed to the front in political campaigns and in legislative bodies as a sure-fire instrument of success; and for that reason there has grown a system of logrolling, wirepulling, back-scratching politics which has given the professionally dry lobbyists and the politically dry legislators the inconquerable incentive to ignore or stifle legislation having to do with other matters.

It will be readily conceded that at present there are a number of problems more pressingly important than that of prohibition-matters of foreign reparations and debts, the tariff, the collapse of the golden era of prosperity, the recurrent fears of another war, unemployment, the dire distress of the American farmer-all these, most certainly, merit a consideration more urgently than the prohibition problem. No matter how pressing the need, however, for the solution of vitally important economic problems; no matter how perfect an instrument for the solution of any particular problem a proposed bill may be; no matter how ideally and practically equipped and qualified a candidate may be to meet and deal with conditions which indicate his policies as the remedy, the wet-or-dry question is brought to the front, and the solution of the more urgent problem is postponed, the promising bill is pigeonholed or emasculated, and the candidate, if he takes a stand or is even branded as wet or dry, suffers the hostility of a large element of the electorate, and in many cases is defeated by a nonentity who passively represents the prevailing wet or dry notion of the community.

An administration which has been the beneficiary of the dry vote, whether it deserved it or not, may be ever so unhappy and discredited in its handling of oil and other scandals, of dealing with the giant utility and power menace, or of farm relief and unemployment, yet it can always count on apologists and champions among the kept men of the big interests who have had their way, and the professional drys whose activities have been encouraged. Behind the smoke screen of prohibition controversy the interests have dug in and consolidated their lines, while the wet and dry lobbyists and leaders-not the rank and file of their sincere supporters—have been indifferent toward all other issues.

The eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law enacted in pursuance thereof were acclaimed as the final settlement and repose of the liquor question.

The "Wickedsham" report has shown that there has been no settlement or repose, but, on the contrary, that the liquor question is involved in a maze of confusion as complicated as that which the commission itself brought forth. The chief thing proved by the Wickersham report is the interesting psychological fact that convictions and prejudices in reference to prohibition are largely matters of emotion, not reason; largely matters of temperament, not cogitation.

As a lawyer briefs a lawsuit, each member of the commission sorted out those facts best suited to his preconceived notions and ignored the others. There was little, if any, changing of opinions, and the result was not a coherent statement of fact or even an intelligent compromise of conflicting prejudices; but, on the contrary, we beheld an instrument crammed with contradictory and confused findings, opinions, and recommendations. The Wickersham report, indeed, was not the report of the commission itself; it was, rather, the report of the individual members of the commission.

All signs indicate that determined forces are working toward what might well be termed the isolation of this issue, which, like a Halloween pumpkin face, has been so long and so successfully raised up to frighten or divert our politicians and statesmen from the consideration of more important things. It will not be long until a solution will be found for this troublesome question the undue attention to which has so often stood in the way of our fairly discussing or dealing with any others.

Lao-tsze, the great oriental philosopher, more than two centuries ago said, "As restrictions and prohibitions are multiplied in the state the people grow poorer and poorer When the people are subjected to overmuch government the land is thrown into confusion." Whether it be from the restrictions and prohibitions which have been multiplied about us or not, the fact remains that this generation is in a period of Babel-like confusion. It is manifest in the controversies within the religious denominations, the conflicts between factions of political parties, the lessening influence and declining membership of many fraternal societies, the emphasis by business corporations of size at the expense of service and of efficiency over the soul, and in thousands of other ways throughout the whole structure of our society. There is hopeless confusion in voices among those who have come forth with suggestions for ways out of the seemingly hopeless muddle in which we find ourselves over the liquor question. It is no use to debate the question as to whether we have come where we are because the amendment and the law could not be enforced, or because there has never been a "sincere attempt" to enforce them. We are where we are. To get out some have proposed the repeal of the prohibition amendment, a plan impossible so long as there shall remain 13 dry States.

Others would amend the Volstead Act as to alcoholic content of liquor, but this plan, with the usual and probable number of dry Congressmen in our legislative halls-both sincerely and only politically so, is not yet an early possibility. Among the alternatives proposed in the event of repeal have been the remanding back to the States of the power to prohibit or permit the traffic and the setting up by the Government of machinery for controlling the manufacture and distribution of intoxicating liquor. The only suggestion in all the opinions of the Wickersham Commission, which might be said to approximate a consensus was the "Anderson plan." It will most likely be some such a plan which will ultimately be adopted, and which will most nearly represent a concensus of public opinion as to what should be done. Such a plan would have these results: The elimination of profit from the traffic and the removal of all incentive to the bootlegger, bandit, and racketeer to engage in it: the product would be pure and free from poison and could be obtained at a price near the actual cost.

In their groping for a way out the sponsors of the various plans and schemes have been much like the bewildered motorist whose car balks and stops, and who proceeds to explore and inspect the entire mechanism to discover the source of trouble; last of all he looks into and finds his gasoline tank empty. Some things in the law are so fundamental that they are rarely remembered. And it is just possible that fundamentals have been overlooked in the endless discussions of prohibition. It is the purpose of this article to present a very ancient but yet living fundamental proposition of law.

That the law is by no means an exact science has been impressed upon the mind of lawyer and layman alike by the many divided decisions of the United States Supreme Court. The lawyer must in many situations found his advice or opinion upon what he believes the majority view of the courts would be. In cases of doubt, one guess is as good as another until the guess of the court of last resort becomes the law of the land for the time being.

One of the ancient maxims of the law is "Rex non potest peccare," or "The king can do no wrong." There is another maxim, complementary to that, which, in translation, reads, "The king is not bound by any statute, if he be not expressly named to be so bound."

Blackstone (Commentaries, vol. 1, ch. 7, sec. 262), discussing prerogative of the King, says:

I shall only farther remark that the King is not bound by any act of Parliament, unless he be named therein by special and particular words. The most general words that can be devised (any person or persons, bodies politic and corporate, etc.) affect not him in the least, if they may tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights or interests.

In Broom's Legal Maxims (Ninth Ed. Byrne, p. 51) is this proposition, supported by numerous English decisions:

In general, the King is not bound by a statute, unless mentioned expressly or referred to by necessary implication; "for it is inferred, prima facie, that the law made by the Crown, with the assent of the Lords and Commons, is made for subjects and not for the Crown"; and the general rule is that the Crown is never bound by a statutory enactment unless the intention of the legislature to bind the Crown is clear and unmistakable.

In the same work—page 52—the author, illustrating the principle, mentions several regulatory laws which were held in the cases cited as not applying to or binding upon the King. It is said:

So, too, the Crown is not bound (except where expressly mentioned) by the provisions of the bankruptcy acts, nor by the locomotive act, 1865, which regulates the speed at which locomotives may proceed on highways, nor by the public health act, 1875, or other acts imposing pecuniary burdens on property, or restraining the use of property.

In America there is no king, but we do have an uncrowned monarch known as the will of the majority, and that monarch of ours has all the necessary attributes of a crowned king, namely, sovereign power.

The principle that the king can do no wrong and is not bound by any statute unless expressly so intended has been adopted and firmly established as the law in America. It has been upheld by many decisions through the years, although the occasion for its application does not often arise. A few only of the decisions, typical of the theory and reasoning of all, will be noticed.

The first is the early case of State ex rel. Parrott v. Board of Public Works (36 Ohio State, 409). The third paragraph of the syllabus reads:

The State is not bound by the terms of a general statute, unless is be so expressly enacted.

At page 414, in the opinion by Chief Justice McIlvain, one of the greatest of Ohio jurists, is the language:

The doctrine seems to be that a sovereign state, which can make and unmake laws, in prescribing general laws intends thereby to regulate the conduct of subjects only, and not its own conduct. * * * Indeed, the doctrine of the common law expressed in the maxim "the king is not bound by any statute, if he be not expressly named to be so bound" (Broom Leg. Max. 51), applies to States in this country as well.

That case was cited with approval and commented upon by the Ohio Supreme Court in the case of State ex rel. Attorney General v. Cincinnati Central Railway Company (37 Ohio State, 157, 176) as follows:

The principle is well established and is indispensable to the security of the public right. The general business of the legislative power is to establish laws for individuals, not for the State.

Congress at one time enacted a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia by any person without a license. The court held that by that act Congress did not intend to prohibit the continuance of such sales in the Capitol restaurants under arrangements with its own committees. (Page v. District of Columbia, 20 App. D. C. 469.)

The "police power" in our system of government has been exerted in accordance with the principle of another ancient maxim, "The welfare of the people is the supreme law." It is the inherent power of self-preservation possessed by every constitutional government. No definition of this power satisfactory to lawyers or courts has been given, but one excellent one was given in an informal way by the late Chief Justice White. He stated in substance that the police power is a power which is coextensive with the necessity for it. Typical definitions of a more formal sort follow:

The police power in its broadest acceptation means the general power of a government to preserve and promote the general welfare by prohibiting all things hurtful to the comfort, safety, and welfare of society and establishing such rules and regulations for the conduct of all persons and the use and management of all property as may be conducive to the public interest. (22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 916.)

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that

The police power of States extends to the protection of lives, limbs, health, comfort, morals, and quiet of society. (83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 21, 394.)

It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the public needs. (Camfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. Ed. 260, 17 Sup. Ct. Rpt. 864.) It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare. (Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 111, 55 L. Ed. 112.)

In the case of Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts (97 U.S. 25, 24 L. Ed. 989) the court said:

Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the extent and boundaries of the police power, and however difficult it may be to render a satisfactory definition of it, there seems to be no doubt that it does extend to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens and to the preservation of good order and the public morals. The legislature can not, by any contract, divest itself of the power to provide for these objects. They belong emphatically to that class of objects which demand the application of the maxim "Salus populi suprema lex," and they are to be attained and provided for by such appropriate means as the legislative discretion may devise. That discretion can no more be bargained away than the power itself. (Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. Ed., 302.) bargained away than th U. S. 645, 24 L. Ed., 302.)

The police power under our constitutional system has been left to the States; it has at all times belonged to them, was never surrendered by them, and has not been directly restrained by the Federal Constitution. That proposition is too well established to call for supporting authorities. The legislative body can not be divested of its discretion to legislate under the police power; that power is not exhausted by a single employment of it, but may be used again and again, as often as the public interests may require.

Prohibition legislation falls under the police power and such measures are under the reserved powers of the several States. The police power of a State extends to all matters relating to the peace, health, safety, and morals of its citizens, and everything pertaining to its domestic economy. (U. S. v. DeWitt (9 Wall. 41, 19 L. Ed. 593); Federalist, No. 45, 216, Passenger cases (7 How. 523, 550); Groves v. Slaughter (15 Peters 512); License Cases (5 How. 589, 631); Holmes v. Jennison (14 Peters 568); Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 203.)

Most persons have read about and heard of the eighteenth amendment, but few, indeed, have ever seen it. It is well for that reason to give it here.

AMENDMENT XVIII

SECTION I

After one year from the ratification of this article, the manufac-After one year from the rauheation of this article, the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all Territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SECTION II

The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The precise wording of the amendment justifies the following conclusions: First, there is no absolute mandate to Congress or the State legislatures to enact enforcing legislation; second, it recognizes and leaves unimpaired the police power of the States; and third, it leaves the propriety of enforcement acts to the discretion of the lawmaking

Exercising its concurrent power, Congress enacted the Volstead law, which provides (U. S. C., chap. 27, sec. 12)

No person shall manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in the chapter—

And so forth.

The act defines the word "person" to mean and include natural persons, associations, copartnerships, and corporations

It will be observed that the eighteenth amendment and the enforcing acts by Congress and State legislatures do and can only prohibit and penalize the manufacture, sale, and so forth, of intoxicating liquors by natural persons, as individuals, or as associates in one or another form of volunteer or corporate entities. The amendment, the Volstead Act, and the various State laws enacted under it, have not closed the door to Congress or the State legislatures against further exercise of their power to act again and again, as changing conditions may require, or as may be held by a "strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare." There is nothing to prevent Congress or the State legislatures from setting up Federal or State machinery for working out some such a system as the "Anderson plan" to control and regulate the manufacture and distribution of intoxicating liquor.

On the contrary, the clear right of Congress or the several legislatures to do that very thing has been declared by the Supreme Court of South Carolina, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, as will be seen from the following cases:

3. The State, under its police power, can itself assume entire control and management of those subjects, such as intoxicating liquor, that are dangerous to the peace, good order, health, morals, and welfare of the people, even when trade is one of the instruments of such State control.

4. The South Carolina dispensary act of 1893, making all alcolholic liquors contraband and subject to seizure unless bought from a State officer whose appointment is provided for, and who is not addicted to the use of such liquors as a beverage, and providing that the liquors sold by him shall be tested and found pure before sale and can be sold only in the daytime and by the packviding that the liquors sold by him shall be tested and found pure before sale and can be sold only in the daytime and by the package which can not be broken nor the liquor drunk on the premises, and that no sale shall be made to a minor, person intoxicated, or in the habit of drinking to excess, or unknown to the dispenser, and that a majority of the voters in any township may prevent the establishment of a dispensary therein, is a valid exercise of the police power of the State.

7. The constitutional reservation to the people of all powers not delegated does not restrict the exercise of the police power so as to defeat the assumption by the State of the exclusive control and management of the sale of intoxicating liquors. (State ex. rel v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 3d, 4th, and 7th Syl.)

The United States Supreme Court recognized the right of South Carolina, in the exercise of its sovereign power, to take charge of the business of selling intoxicating liquors. (State of S. C. v. U. S., 199 U. S. 437, 50 L. ed. 261.)

In all of these decisions the rights of the States in cases identical with the problem under consideration were recognized. It has become a legal commonplace for the State to do or refuse to do anything prohibited or enjoined to be done by others in our State or National statutes, so long as the State, as in the prohibition amendment and the Volstead Act, is not expressly mentioned as being bound. Each State underiably has the right under existing laws to pass such legislation as it pleases to provide for the manufacture and sale within its borders of intoxicating liquors, all, of course, as an incidental part of its sovereign power. Each State may take over the entire intrastate liquor traffic as its exclusive province, and by virtue of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act or by further State legislation stifle all bootleg competition. Upon the premise that the State is not expressly prohibited from such acts under the eighteenth amendment, the lawful exercise of this inherent right is scarcely open to dispute.

The cure for the beverage ills of the Nation, the prevalence of lawlessness, which is incidental to prohibition enforcement such as we have had, even a large portion of the misconduct and immorality of our younger generation-to whom drinking is not a pastime or a pleasure but seemingly a social obligation—the cure for these ills lies in the serious consideration of fundamental legal principles.

There is no need, as a matter of fact, to worry about the repeal of the eighteenth amendment or any of its enforcing legislation. Let them stand as a deterrent to the offenses which cling to the illicit private manufacture and sale of liquor. With State or Government control, attractive profits would be eliminated, the purity and safety of the products assured, and the opportunities of the furtive purveyor of "white mule," "synthetic gin," "bottled in the barn," or the various kinds of "real stuff" would be rare, indeed. Better still, the long-running controversy would be either ended or relegated to the background of academic concern, and the professional lobbyists, both wet and dry, who obey the command of Iago, "Put money in thy purse; follow thou the wars," will be obliged to take on another

BRIDGE BETWEEN DAVENPORT AND MOLINE

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert two letters in the RECORD. These are from the mayor of Davenport and a business man of that town. They are in relation to a bridge bill that was passed yesterday, and pertain to my statement that the city of Davenport has voted a bond issue for the construction of the bridge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters from the mayor of Davenport, Iowa, and a business man there pertaining to my statement yesterday that the city of Davenport has voted a bond issue for the construction of a bridge between Davenport and Moline:

JANUARY 28, 1932.

Congressman B. M. JACOBSEN, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Mr. J. L. Hecht, a member of the bridge commission, is forwarding to you a bill to extend the time limit on the building of a bridge between Davenport and Moline.

The people of Davenport voted for this bridge last summer at a special election, and it was carried by a vote of three to one.

We are very much interested in having this extension of time, due to the fact that the bonds will be revenue bonds and the market is none too good at the present time.

Please give this your consideration and cooperate with Congressman ALLEN, from Illinois, who I feel well satisfied will help you in having this time extended.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE C. TANK, Mayor.

FRENCH & HECHT (INC.), Davenport, Iowa, February 13, 1932.

Hon. B. M. JACOBSEN.

Hon. B. M. Jacobsen,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Congressman: Replying to your favor of February 11, 1932, regarding request of Mr. Rayburn, chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, asking for further information regarding activities in connection with the proposed bridge.

Considerable engineering has already been done. This engineering has included location of terminals, location of piers, length and number of spans, and the determination of other data as required by the Board of Army Engineers.

required by the Board of Army Engineers.

The city of Davenport, by special election, voted a municipal revenue bond issue for the purpose of financing this project and making it a municipal bridge. The individuals to whom this franchise was originally granted have entered into an agreement with the city of Davenport to the above effect.

The communication cent you by the mayor of Davenport also substantiates what is here said.

Arrangements have been made with a banking house to finance

Arrangements have been made with a banking house to finance this proposition as soon as it is possible to do so.

Arrangements have also been made with the engineering firm of Modjeski, Masters & Chase to engineer and build the bridge.

We have held hearings before the Board of Army Engineers and have met all requirements. We now have a permit issued by the Board of Army Engineers to proceed with this work.

I should be pleased to give any further information desired.

Please be assured that your interest and attention in this matter are very much appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

Copy to Masslich & Mitchell, Mr. Masters, Mr. Chase, Mr. Harris. LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I have been absent from the House by reason of an automobile accident, which I regret, and by reason of certain litigation pending in Kentucky I feel constrained to ask leave of absence for an indefinite period.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, we now have under consideration most important legislation. I sympathize with the gentleman and I have no doubt the business he desires to attend to in Kentucky is of tremendous importance, otherwise he would not make this request. However, the gentleman is one of the effective Members of this House, and while I regret very much to do so, I am compelled to object.

PROPOSET AMENDMENT TO THE REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, for the information of the Members, an amendment I propose to offer at the end of title 4 of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment follows:

"Provided. That if at any time prior to June 30, 1934, the President finds that for a period of 60 days the average wholesale commodity price level is within 10 points as high as the average wholesale commodity price level of the year 1926, indicated by the figure 100 in the Revised Index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, he shall issue a proclamation to that effect, and upon the issuance of such proclamation the provisions of this title shall cease to be in effect."

THE SALES TAX

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting an editorial of the Wheeling Register under date of March 16 against the sales tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Speaking before the Republican State committee at its recent meeting in Parkersburg, Senator H. D. Hatfield made a strong and unassailable case against the gross-sales tax. As he sees it—

"The gross-sales tax as applied in West Virginia is iniquitous, unfair, and unjust. In many instances it taxes the unprofitable business. It exacts duplication of taxation in the process of conversion of the raw material into the finished product. It taxes the hospitals that are never profit making. It taxes the new born and the dead alike in its application.

"It is ramifying in its application without a beginning or end.

"It exacts the same toll from the unprofitable as it does from the profitable business."

A more concise or accurate description of the gross-sales tax in West Virginia could hardly be given.

West Virginia could hardly be given.

And every word that Senator HATFIELD says about the inequitable West Virginia measure applies with equal truth and force to the proposed manufacturers' sales tax which would be spread over the entire Nation.

If the manufacturers' tax were given its proper name it would be called not a manufacturers' tax but a consumers' tax.

No tax will be charged at the store, no tax bill will be handed over to the individual customer. Each transaction will be as before. But the tax nevertheless will be included in the price. It will be ed on from the manufacturer, the dealer, the retailer, directly to the buyer.

In other words, in this depressed year the people are to have

In other words, in this depressed year the people are to have their cost of living increased 2½ per cent, or more likely 5 per cent, as prices go up under cover of the tax.

If Congressmen running for reelection think they can load this new burden upon the straining backs of the American people and that it will go unnoticed, they are due for a surprise.

Congress is asking the American people for a billion and a quarter dollars under the new revenue bill. In return they have reduced governmental operating expenses the munificent sum of $125,000,000.

A dime for a dollar! It is a wild assumption in such a year for

A dime for a dollar! It is a wild assumption, in such a year, for anyone to think they can put over a deal like this and escape either notice or retribution.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who dost bind us to life by sweet and holy ties, twining the tendrils of our hearts around loved ones and friends; make us so to love the blessed things Thou dost impart by voices and by silences, in moments of illumination and in hours of obscurity, through pleasure and through pain, in the labor to which we are compelled and in the sickness that interrupts our labor, in the experience that brings strength and in the temptation that lays bare our weakness, that being taught of Thee from day to day we may be found faithful in every relationship of life.

Speak peace to the hearts of all who are afflicted or distressed in our beloved Southland, and do Thou comfort and relieve them according to their several necessities, giving them patience under their sufferings and a happy issue out of all their afflictions.

We ask it for the sake of Him whom Thou hast sent to bear our griefs and carry our sorrows, Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from their consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the changes of reference will be made.

RELIEF OF DISTRESSED CITIZENS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion coming over from a previous day, which will be stated

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma IMr. THOMAS] moves to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish equipment, goods, and supplies to governors and acting governors for use in aid of distressed citizens.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday I entered a motion to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 80. I now call up that motion. In support of the motion and giving the basis for the suggested legislation I submit for the RECORD a telegram sent me by Carl C. Magee, of the Oklahoma News. I ask that the telegram may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Senator ELMER THOMAS,

Senator Elmer Thomas,

Care Senate Chamber:

Oklahoma City faced with serious problem housing dependent families. Have leased 100 acres and establishing temporary camp, in which hope house approximately 350 families now living in every type of shack, all undesirable and threatening entire city has unsanitary health conditions. Centralized camp to be every type of shack, all undesirable and threatening entire city because unsanitary health conditions. Centralized camp to be under the jurisdiction of the city government. Local community fund authorities and unemployment relief committee have taken the matter up with Governor Murray and General Barrett, who indorsed plan and have asked War Department through Colonel Haskell to supply the following equipment: Four hundred pyramidal tents, 1,000 regulation Army cots, 1,000 regulation Army blankets, 2 regulation Army field kitchens, 6 regulation Army field ranges, 6 regulation G. I. cans, 400 Sibley tent stoves and necessary pipe, 1 regulation delouser. Colonel Haskell advises regulations make impossible to issue only required blankets and cots. Absolutely imperative we have entire equipment. We would need equipment for approximately five months. Also imperative we receive this equipment either from Fort Sam Houston or Fort Sill not later than this week. Your assistance and influence in Sill not later than this week. Your assistance and influence in making possible to issue this Federal equipment to this city will be greatly appreciated. Please advise by wire.

CARL C. MAGEE Editor the Oklahoma News.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the facts are that the committee of Oklahoma City had already telegraphed the Secretary of War asking for some equipment to take care of the unemployed, and the Secretary had turned down in part the application. I ask to have read a a copy of the message from the Secretary of War addressed to Mr. Magee, the chairman of the special committee in Oklahoma City.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 12, 1932.

Editor Oklahoma News, Oklahoma City, Okla.:
Reference your telegram January 9 requesting various articles of Army equipment for alleviating housing and unemployment problem your city, War Department has instructed all corps area commanders to cooperate with local authorities in extending relief commanders to cooperate with local authorities in extending relief to fullest extent along following lines: Loan of cots and blankets, when available, to charitable organizations upon request of governor of any State. Sale of salvaged clothing, when available, at nominal prices to charitable organizations as well as sale of certain surplus clothing at fixed reduced prices. Speeding up of construction and maintenance work whenever possible within limits of appropriations made by Congress. Department's program is necessarily limited to that outlined above in absence of congressional authority. Regretted that all items desired by you can not be supplied. Stocks of such equipment have been greatly depleted during past few years on account of relief work incident to floods and droughts.

Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War.

PATRICK J. HURLEY, Secretary of War.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, at this point I call attention to one line in this telegram. I read the excerpt in answer to the statement made yesterday by the chairman of the committee that he had been advised by the Secretary of War that the Secretary had ample authority to do all the things that were asked to be done and that could be done or were necessary to be done. In his reply to a committee of my State the Secretary of War states that he could not furnish certain equipment because of the absence of congressional legislation. The exact language is as fol-

Department's program is necessarily limited to that outlined above in absence of congressional authority.

Mr. President, when the situation was called to my attention, in order to give the Secretary of War the authority that he evidently desired, I introduced Senate Joint Resolution No. 80. The joint resolution does not propose to direct the Secretary of War to do anything; it does propose, however, to give him the authority to do those things that he wants to do, in order to take care of communities in distress. On the 15th of January, immediately following receipt of the communication from the Secretary of War, the resolution was introduced. I ask that the text of the joint resolution as originally introduced be made a part of my remarks, but I shall not ask that it be now read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish equipment, goods, and supplies to governors and acting governors for use in aid of distressed citizens, as originally introduced, is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That upon the request from any governor or acting governor of any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, for equipment, goods, and supplies, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make available to any such governor or acting governor, such equipment, goods, and supplies, for the use and benefit of any such State, Territory, or possession, in connection with relief work for citizens in distress: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall make and promulgate rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The joint resolution is short, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I myself should like to hear the joint resolution read, for I am not familiar with it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The reason I am not asking that the joint resolution may now be read is that it was referred to a subcommittee and the subcommittee struck out all after the resolving clause and reported a substitute which to me was satisfactory. For that reason, while the subject is the same, the text is slightly changed.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will have the amended joint resolution read that will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will do so in a moment. I am trying to give the history of this proposed legislation.

The joint resolution was by the Committee on Military Affairs in the usual course of business sent to the War Department for a report. The Secretary of War, as is his custom and conforming to our practice, sent a report to the chairman of the committee. I send to the desk a copy of the report of the Secretary of War and ask that it may be Such replacement could be effected only by a corresponding increase in Army appropriations, and the proposed bill makes no provision for such purpose.

For the reasons stated above, the department does not favor the passage of the proposed bill.

PATRICK J. HURLEY, Secretary of War.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, as I proceed I desire, if I may, to present the cumulative evidence upon the point that I desire to call attention to later. In the message to the committee in Oklahoma City the Secretary of War stated that he had no congressional authority to furnish these supplies. In his report on the joint resolution he states that there is no law on the subject.

After his report was received by the Committee on Military Affairs, I personally appeared before the committee and made a brief statement. I want to say in behalf of the chairman of the committee that he was ill at that time and was not present, but shortly thereafter the joint resolution was referred to a subcommittee, of which, if I remember correctly, the distinguished junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Carey] was named chairman. In due course of time the subcommittee considered the resolution together with the report of the War Department on such resolution. The only difference between the joint resolution introduced by me and the report of the War Department was that the measure I introduced made no provision that, in the event supplies were furnished, the department should be reimbursed for such supplies. So the Secretary of War suggested, if such supplies were to be used for the purpose of taking care of people in distress, that there should be some plan provided whereby the department could be reimbursed for the cost or the value of such supplies. So the subcommittee submitted a report, embracing the same subject matter, but with a provision that, in the event application was made by the governor of a State to the Secretary of War and supplies were furnished. the Secretary of War should submit a report to the succeeding Congress and ask for an appropriation to reimburse the department for the supplies so furnished.

Mr. President, I ask that the clerk may read the copy of the amended joint resolution as reported by the Military Affairs Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee reported to strike out all after the resolving clause of Senate Joint Resolution No. 80 and in lieu thereof to insert:

That whenever by reason of storm, flood, famine, earthquake, That whenever by reason of storm, flood, famine, earthquake, or other emergency, considerable numbers of the people of any State, Territory, or dependency of the United States are rendered destitute or in peril of death or suffering from starvation, natural violence, or exposure to the elements, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, and under such regulations as he shall prescribe, and at the request of the chief executive of the State or Territorial government concerned, to employ such military forces, equipment, transportation, services, and supplies of the United States as are available for such emergency relief military forces, equipment, transportation, services, and supplies of the United States as are available for such emergency relief measures as the said Secretary shall deem appropriate; and the Secretary of War shall annually submit to Congress, through the Bureau of the Budget, estimates to cover the amounts necessary to be appropriated to reimburse the War Department for the funds expended and the property and equipment used, lost, damaged, or destroyed in carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. At this point, Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the complete text of the report submitted by the committee.

The report (No. 194) is as follows:

Amend the title so as to read:

The report of the Secretary of War on the original resolution is made a part of this report and is printed below.

PATRICK J. HURLEY, Secretary of War.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the only difference between the original joint resolution and the amended joint resolution is that in its amended form it provides that, in the event the War Department is called upon to furnish and does actually furnish some tents or some cots or some clothing or some medicine or some food to a stricken community, when the next Congress convenes a report of the matter shall be submitted, with an estimate of the cost, and the Congress will be asked to appropriate the money to reimburse the department for such supplies.

Mr. President, the joint resolution as amended was reported to the Senate, with a formal report, and placed on the calendar. I was not present when the report was made. If I had been, I would have asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution; but before we had a morning hour, before the joint resolution could be brought up again when I was not present, the joint resolution was recommitted to the Committee on Military

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Was the report from the Military Affairs Committee a favorable report?

Mr. NORRIS. I mean from the full committee to the

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The report from the subcommittee was favorable, and the report from the full committee was favorable. As to the vote in the committee, or whether there was a vote, of course, I am not advised.

After the joint resolution was recommitted to the committee I took occasion to confer with the chairman, suggested my continued interest in this proposed legislation, and asked as a special favor that the joint resolution be brought back to the floor, if not with a favorable report. then with an unfavorable report. That is all I could ask at

The evidence is clear before the Senate: the Secretary of War has stated in two communications that he has not the authority of law to furnish stricken communities with certain kinds of equipment necessary to afford relief in times of emergencies.

Mr. President, because I do not desire to force the Secretary of War or any other responsible official to break the law in rendering assistance to stricken areas, I have introduced this bill, and I have made a motion that it be withdrawn from the Committee on Military Affairs and placed upon the calendar for further consideration by the Senate.

I ask for a record vote upon my motion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I assume full responsibility for asking that this bill be recommitted. I desire to make a short statement in explanation of my action.

There is not any particularly serious question involved in the bill. As a matter of fact, the Army realizes that it exists for the purpose of serving the people of the United States. Naturally, if an emergency exists, the Army, without waiting for legislative authority, takes such steps as it can to deal with it. The Army will not wait for Congress to authorize it to restore order somewhere. It will not wait for Congress to authorize it to give of its supply to prevent starvation, or freezing, or something like that happening to a stricken group of people in the United States. As I say, the Army exists to serve the people of the United States, and it will do it whether we pass authorizing, liberalizing statutes

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What I can not understand is the fact that the Senator seems to take the position that it is better to leave the War Department to exercise a discretion without authority of law than to give the department the authority.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why?

Mr. REED. That seems a strange attitude, and that is what I rose to express.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do feel that it is a strange attitude for a great lawyer to assume.

Mr. REED. If I may anticipate myself, I am going to end by agreeing, as far as I can, that the joint resolution may be reported now and the committee discharged and the joint resolution put on the calendar; but I desire to make this statement. Possibly I am talking to somebody beyond the Senate Chamber—somebody who wants to understand why it is that I am always denying relief.

The Army does that now. It advances cots, and it advances blankets, and it advances supplies, where it can, because of that conception of its function to serve the public. But when we put this joint resolution on the statute books we are issuing an invitation to the people of the United States to treat the Army as if it were the Red Cross. Every year it becomes harder to keep up the Army appropriations. Every year the pacifist sentiment grows, and every dollar that is appropriated for the Army is bitterly resented by a great many people. You can not explain to the man out in the distant country who criticizes an Army appropriation that this $100,000 had to be appropriated because the Army gave it to starving people in some flood or cyclone or other disaster. We are called militaristic for every dollar we appropriate for the poor old Army; and that is why I dread to see the Army treated as if it were the Red Cross.

When we appropriate money for the Red Cross, that is considered praiseworthy; and yet we put on the books statutes like this, which in effect make the Army a qualified social-service organization, a qualified charity organization, thereby making it just that much harder for us to keep up the military efficiency of the Army.

That is my only objection to this measure. These people can have the cots, and the Secretary of War will be glad to advance them if he has them. It is not that we want to prevent the relief. I sometimes think that there are parts of this country in which anybody who bumps his nose howls to the Federal Government for relief, and I think we have gone too far on that point; but I am not up here to criticize that.

Mr. ASHURST. Parts only, Mr. President?

Mr. REED. Yes; up in my State we do not—I mean, excepting certain present public officials who howl for Federal relief instead of doing their own work. Generally speaking, however, the people of my State try to take care of distress there by their own local charities. I think in some places there is a disposition to lean too heavily on Washington; but that is a big question, and I do not mean to take the time of the Senate about it.

I merely want to explain why I hesitate to see us put on the statute books a provision that is tantamount to an invitation to treat the Army as if it were the Red Cross. It is not that I object to giving the relief where we can do it. I object to anything that looks as though that were the Army's primary function; and I am thinking a little bit in anticipation of the trouble that we are going to have to keep up the Army appropriation in this very Congress, where it has been cut to the very bone now. If we are going to have to cut another 10 per cent off it, God help the Army!

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President-

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire at this point to suggest to the Senator that I would not want to concede, by the passage of any law, that the Secretary of War has any jurisdiction in the premises under circumstances which, with the Senator's permission, I desire to relate.

The governor of a State is the commander in chief of the military forces of that State, the militia. In all cases of emergency—whether it be that of disturbance in the nature of a riot, a flood which drives people out of their homes without shelter, a forest fire that drives people from the area where they reside without shelter, or a tornado, where their homes are blown down, and they are without shelter—it seems to me that the governor, as commander in chief, has ample power, authority, and jurisdiction to requisition the quartermaster's department within his State—

Mr. REED. The Senator means, of the National Guard?
Mr. BLAINE. As a part of the National Guard unit, which has possession and control of all Federal property, such as guns, ammunition, trucks, spades, shovels, tents, cots, sometimes food, and all the essential and necessary equipment to carry out the relief.

Now, as I understand the situation to be, and as I perceived it to be when I had the honor of being governor of my State, the governor has the right to requisition the use of that war material for those purposes; and the only responsibility of the State is that it see to it that the property in kind is returned to the possession of the Federal Government.

Mr. REED. The Senator is right as far as the property in the hands of the National Guard of the State is concerned.

Mr. BLAINE. I mentioned property that was in the control and possession of the quartermaster department that belonged to the Federal Government.

Mr. REED. The quartermaster's department of the National Guard of the State is under the control of the governor, and he has the power to use any of the material that is consigned to the National Guard practically as he pleases, subject to the property accountability to make it good later.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly.

Mr. REED. He has not that power over property in the hands of the Federal Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Governor of New York, for example, could not seize all of the supplies on Governors Island at the Federal station there.

Mr. BLAINE. That was my conception also.

Mr. REED. But the Senator will see the difference between the procedure he has in mind and that which is contemplated by this bill. If the Governor of Oklahoma takes the blankets and the tents and the cots that have been issued to the Oklahoma National Guard, the State of Oklahoma will have to make them good; while, on the other hand, if they can be obtained from the Army of the United States, the State of Oklahoma gets the benefit, but it has not any liability at all. The burden falls entirely upon the Federal Treasury; and that, I take it, is the purpose of the bill.

If they wanted to use Oklahoma National Guard blankets and cots, they could have done it in an hour, but they would have to make them good later. Instead of doing that, they send to the Senators in Washington, and they telegraph the War Department, because while Oklahoma wants the relief, Oklahoma apparently does not want to pay for it. I take it that that is the situation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think it is only fair to state, in response to what has just been said, that in my State the National Guard furnished all the equipment that it had available; but the camp at Oklahoma City wanted some stoves and field kitchens and a class of equipment that the National Guard does not possess, and that is the particular kind of equipment that was denied.

Mr. REED. I was not so informed. I understood that the National Guard in Oklahoma had an abundant supply to take care of the needs at that particular camp. However, be that as it may, I am going to agree, as far as I am concerned, that the committee may be discharged and the joint resolution go on the calendar with this report. Then, if the Senate wants to establish this policy, I can only cast my single vote against it.

Mr. President, I ask that the committee may be discharged and the joint resolution be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, just before the Senate adjourned last evening I gave notice that at the first opportunity I intended to call up House bill 9642, to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view of increasing employment. Subsequently the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] gave notice that he intended to call up the Philippine independence bill.

The authors of the Philippine independence bill, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Hawes] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Cutting], are not present in the Senate today. I have conferred with other members of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs; and while I have not spoken to all of them, I find only the chairman of the committee anxious to discuss that bill to-day. We have had the road bill before the Senate on two other occasions. Inasmuch as the revenue bill can not be considered to-day, I express the hope that a way can be found to devote the day to the discussion of the road bill; and if there is no filibustering against it, I am sure we can dispose of it one way or the other in the time that would be available.

I make this statement now because I understand that if I am not recognized, and the calendar is taken up, and a motion is made to take up a bill, the motion is not debatable and can not be amended.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the other day the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Hawes] stated the present situation in regard to the Philippine independence bill, and the importance of having it considered at the earliest possible opportunity. I assured him that I would do everything in my power to bring it before the Senate, and let the various proposals for amending it be debated.

It appeared last night that there might be such a possibility to-day, and I stated that I would make an effort to get the Philippine independence measure before the Senate to-day. I now find that both of the authors of the bill, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Hawes] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Cutting], are absent, out of the city, the Senator from Missouri having been called to New York, and being expected to return to-morrow; that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who had prepared a substitute, is not ready to offer his substitute and debate it to-day, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], who also has a substitute to offer, does not wish to take it up to-day. So that I will be in the embarrassing position, if I make the motion, of having to do most of the debating myself. I intend to offer only a few remarks in explanation of the measure, and in view of the fact that the authors of the bill are not here, and that the Senators who wish to discuss it are not present, or do not wish to have it taken up to-day, I shall not make the motion which I stated last night would be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE-ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 3237. An act to legalize a bridge across the Mississippi River at Grand Rapids, Minn.; and

S. 3322. An act to transfer certain jurisdiction from the War Department in the management of Indian country.

PROHIBITION A MAJOR ISSUE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to an extremely interesting editorial appearing in the Washington Daily News to-day, an editorial appearing, I am informed, in all the papers of the Scripps-Howard Syndicate throughout the United States. It is signed by Robert P. Scripps, editor in chief. It is entitled "Meeting a Major Issue." I am going to ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, but before doing so I should like to call attention to two or three very striking paragraphs from it. Mr. Scripps says:

The Scripps-Howard newspapers favor immediate modification of the Volstead Act, repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and return of the liquor problem to the States for the following

Present statutory definitions of the alcoholic content of "intoxicating" beverages have no scientific basis in fact, while suppression of beer and wines creates a market limited to much more harmful spirituous drinks.

Any Federal sumptuary legislation is at variance with the whole spirit of the Constitution, which is that of the widest possible degree of home rule.

He goes on a little later:

The Scripps-Howard newspapers believe that Federal prohibition will properly be a major issue in every congressional election this year.

Various leading members of political parties have stated within the last few days that prohibition would not be a major issue, that it was not in politics, that it was being used only to becloud the major issues. The Scripps-Howard newspapers, however, believe it will be a major issue in every congressional election this year, and in the presidential election next November, for these reasons:

So long as this question, cutting deeply into the hearts of the people, cuts crosswise through each of our great political parties, as well as through progressive and liberal groups in Congress, the development of no sane and logical economic program by any party or group is possible. Until the question of Federal prohibition is settled, other progress, the routing of criminals, the clearing out of political corruption, waits throughout the country.

That the question is far from settled as it now stands, in spite of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law, is demonstrated by the expressed dissatisfaction of millions of people, as well as by the continued and "from bad to worse" drinking habits of the entire country.

The Scripps-Howard newspapers have supported the legislative activities and extolled the characters of outstanding statesmen like, for instance, Senators Norris, Costigan, and Walsh of Mon-

Nevertheless, other things being equal or nearly equal as in

Nevertheless, other things being equal, or nearly equal, as in the Pennsylvania case, it will be the policy of these newspapers to point out, with respect to each of this year's congressional and senatorial candidates, that his vote in the near future on prohibition will probably be the most important vote he will ever cast in the new Congress.

I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEETING A MAJOR ISSUE

The Pittsburgh Press, a Scripps-Howard newspaper, nounced its support of Senator and ex-Secretary of Labor James J. Davis in the Republican senatorial primary in Pennsylvania. In the past the Pittsburgh Press, and other Scripps-Howard newspapers, have opposed the brand of conservative and stand-pat party politics with which Davis has been identified, in his State and at Washington.

In this instance Senator Davis has declared himself as favoring In this instance Senator Davis has declared himself as favoring modification of the Volstead Act and repeal of the eighteenth amendment. His opponent, the colorful Gen. Smedley D. Butler, of Marine Corps and Philadelphia Police Department fame, is a well-known 100 per cent prohibitionist, and is chiefly supported by a no less prominent prohibitionist, Gov. Gifford Pinchot.

As Senator, Davis voted for, and Pinchot and his friends advocated, direct Federal relief for the unemployed. On this matter that two candidacies are nitched apparently, on even ground.

the two candidacies are pitched, apparently, on even ground.

The Pittsburgh Press expresses no overweening enthusiasm for the mental stature or political courage of Candidate Davis. At the same time, its editors have reason to distrust the attitude toward civil liberties of Candidate Butler, which, from speeches he has made in the past, embraces the military and autocratic rather than the American and democratic ideal.

From the above it is obvious that, to the editors of the Pittsburgh Press, the outstanding question involved in the present contest is that of prohibition. This is the issue that is thought paramount.

Wherever other elements of character and public policy permit, this is the stand that other Scripps-Howard newspapers may be expected to take.

expected to take.

And with good, and sufficient, and well-considered reason.

The problem of amending, if not repealing, oppressive Federal prohibition laws has passed out of the realm of academic debate and into the sphere of quite possible political action. In the recent wet-dry test vote in the House of Representatives, 21 reversed votes would have meant a prohibitionist defeat.

This possibility, which becomes almost immediate by reason of the elections this fall, tinges our whole political horizon. Every Congressman and Senator to be elected this year will undoubtedly have the opportunity and the duty, during his term of office, to cast a vote on prohibition that will really count.

Heretofore this situation has not seemed to exist. To-day it dictates only one possible honest course—to meet the issue, and to meet it squarely.

The Scripps-Howard newspapers favor immediate modification of the Volstead Act, repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and return of the liquor problem to the States for the following Proven ineffective in practice, Federal attempts to enforce the prohibition laws infringe the police powers of the States.

While liquor, some of it poisonous, flows freely everywhere, the While liquor, some of it poisonous, nows freely everywhere, the Federal Government foregoes vast sums of revenue from its taxation and is put to enormous futile expense, the whole making up a large part of the present burden of taxpayers. So Federal prohibition goes to the very heart of the present economic crisis.

It is the profits of bootlegging and liquor smuggling that are the "sinews of war" for the major "rackets" that actually threaten our civilization to-day, from kidnaping and banditry to bellot, how stuffing and police corruntion.

The Scripps-Howard newspapers believe that Federal prohibition will properly be a major issue in every congressional election this year, and in the presidential election this November, for these

ROBERT P. SCRIPPS.

Mr. BINGHAM. Before taking my seat, Mr. President, may I say that I hope it will be possible for the Committee on the Judiciary to bring to the floor of the Senate one or more of the various resolutions with regard to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment now before that committee? I hope it will not be necessary to pass on the question of discharging the committee, as was suggested yesterday.

The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has very courteously appointed subcommittees to consider the various features connected with the eighteenth amendment and the possible adoption of additions to the fifth amendment to the Constitution. It is a matter of regret that the subcommittee in charge of the resolutions to repeal have not as yet found it possible to hold hearings on this question or to take up the matter as to which one of the resolutions they would recommend, if any. I do hope that in the very near future this matter may come before us, for I agree entirely with the views expressed by Mr. Scripps in this editorial, that it is one of the major issues now confronting us, and until we get this matter settled it is going to be extremely difficult for the two great political parties to align themselves on various economic issues and get adequate returns from the voters in regard to them.

To-day many voters regard the prohibition question as the most important thing before the country, and they will vote accordingly. Some great organizations have held that they will oppose any candidate of either party favoring repeal or modification. Other great organizations have stated the opposite, that they will oppose any candidate of either party who is in favor of prohibition.

Recent votes in the House of Representatives and in the Senate showed that the question has very evenly divided the political parties. The Republican Party has only a slightly larger number of votes favoring repeal or modification, as shown by the House vote and by the Senate vote, and by the letter to the Judiciary Committee signed yesterday, which shows the unfairness of attempting to keep this matter in concealment, and the necessity for bringing it out and having it settled once and for all, in order that the two great political parties may proceed, each in accordance with its own political philosophy, and not have its representatives defeated by reason of their views on a matter of sumptuary legislation.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if it is in order at this time, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9642, to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire what has become of the call of the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that we are on the calendar under Rule VIII, and the motion of the Senator from Arizona is in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9642.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut IMr. BING-HAM], on page 2, line 1, to strike out the period, insert a comma and the following words: "except that such apportionment shall be wholly on the basis of population."

PRICES OF WHEAT AND COTTON

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from Mr. H. S. Long, of Montgomery, Ala., and a letter from Mr. T. K. Lee, of Birmingham, Ala., in connection with a subject of vital interest to every man here who represents an agricultural State.

It seems to be the prevailing opinion that the conduct of the Department of Agriculture in the last two weeks has been responsible for the decrease in the prices of wheat and of cotton. These two gentlemen have set forth very clearly the reasons for their complaints, and I send the communications to the desk and ask to have them read. I invite the attention of every Senator here from an agricultural State to these communications.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., March 23, 1932.

Senator Hugo BLACK:

For humanity's sake prevail Farm Board or the President give some pointed constructive advice tending bolster rather than destroy further price cotton since announcement board recently. Your constituents have and are suffering sinking prices, adding to already despondent circumstances.

H. S. LONG.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 18, 1932.

Senator Hugo BLACK,

Washington, D. C.
DEAR SENATOR: If our Senators could grant the wishes of all their constituents they would be miracle men, I know. But in times like these, as Brisbane said this morning, somebody, somewhere, soon, with some sense must do something. The people can do nothing, as it is not in their hands. They can vote, and

In the past two days the American wheat market has declined about 5 cents per bushel. Wheat is down 7 cents per bushel in a week. Mr. Milnor, head of the so-called Grain Stabilization Corporation, left for Europe, and possibly sold wheat short before he left, and the word leaked around that he was going over to try and sell 50,000,000 bushels of Farm Board wheat—in competition, of course, with the poor, deluded farmers over here who still have wheat to sell. Same thing applies to the Farm Board's cotton holdings. One flasco follows another, until the shadow of downright disaster hangs over the land. I'm no alarmist, but some of the most foolish things I've ever heard of have been done by the administration of late. The antihoarding campaign but called to the attention of everybody that the Government itself was in a panic, and the net result has been that conditions in the past week have grown rapidly worse in every line.

done by the administration of late. The antihoarding campaign but called to the attention of everybody that the Government itself was in a panic, and the net result has been that conditions in the past week have grown rapidly worse in every line.

It is to be hoped that Congress will promptly pass a bill to impound the wheat and cotton holdings of the Farm Board indefinitely, or until prices for wheat reach a reasonable figure, and cotton the same, say 85 cents for wheat and 10 cents for cotton, or 12 cents. If this can be done quickly, agriculture can take heart, and with it looking up the rest will follow. Instead of competing with the world markets to sell wheat our Government owns at the expense of the farmers of the West—and as to cotton, the farmers of the South—the Government should announce to the world at large that it would not sell one dollar's worth until prices were back to something akin to normal.

prices were back to something akin to normal.

I hope you will sponsor such bills, if any are not pending; and if pending, that you will lend your earnest support to have them passed promptly.

Yours very truly,

T. K. LEE.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in connection with the letter just read I desire to state that I have been informed that a bill is pending before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, a bill introduced by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore], which would require the impounding of the wheat and cotton holdings for a certain period of years. Whether there has been any action on that bill by the committee or not I am not informed. Whether it is likely to be acted on soon, I am not informed. But all of us know that the constant holding over the market of a threat to dispose of this vast holding of wheat and cotton is bound, naturally, to be injurious to the prices of wheat and cotton throughout the world. They have gone down, just as was stated in the letter just read.

It is reported in the press—and, perhaps, the Senator from South Carolina can inform us whether or not this is correct—that the Secretary of Agriculture has sought within the last week to bring about a diversion of the $200,000,000 appropriation authorized by this body from the purpose for which it was originally intended, for loans to farmers, to provide for the sale of wheat to countries in the Far East. I would like to find out from the Senator from South Carolina, if I can, whether that statement is correct or not?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have been approached by those who are in direct contact with the Department of Agriculture, and my information is that a proposition was made to take $100,000,000 of the $200,000,000 allocated for crop purposes and to purchase from the Farm Board a certain amount of cotton and a certain amount of wheat and to dispose of it in the Orient—and, of course, to dispose of it on credit—and to leave the Farm Board the remaining $100,000,000. The Senator is correct that this proposal is still being agitated, as I had a conference this morning with one connected with the Government along the same line, and when the Senator has concluded his remarks I should like to take the floor for a sufficient time to explain just what is involved.

Mr. BLACK. I shall yield the floor in just a moment. Before doing so I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. McNary] whether or not any date has been set for hearings on the bill introduced by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] with reference to impounding the wheat which is now held by the Farm Board?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the bill, but I believe it is the bill to impound a large quantity of Stabilization Board wheat. That bill has been referred to a subcommittee of which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier] is chairman. May I ask the Senator if he is studying the bill of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] to impound certain wheat owned by the Stabilization Board?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. The subcommittee was appointed by the chairman and a hearing was set for Friday or Saturday of last week. On the morning set for the hearing I received a letter from the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] stating that he would reintroduce the bill with an amendment or modification. It was then decided that there would be no further hearing held on that measure until the bill was reintroduced and Senators given opportunity to study it and know what it is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the evidence which has been presented before the committee and indeed before the Senate as to the deterioration of impounded wheat, the large expense involved in maintaining insurance and other costs amounting to nearly a million dollars a year, I believe, I want to ask the Senator if it would not be better to give the wheat away than to impound it indefinitely with this constant expense and with the deterioration which will mean in a little while that the wheat will cease to have any value whatsoever?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it was not my intention at this time to discuss the merits or demerits of the question, but merely to find out the legislative situation. It is certainly true that one of the worst things that can happen to the market is to have held over it constantly a threat such as is held over the market with reference to wheat and cotton. I desired to invite the attention of the Senate to this letter, and particularly I desired to invite the attention of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] to the proposition I have suggested with reference to the attempt to divert the appropriation of $200,000,000 from the purpose for which it was intended, with the evident purpose to injure the cotton and wheat markets of the farmers of the country.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senate is, of course, familiar with the resolution which I introduced and which I later submitted as an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill and which became a part of that measure. That amount is now $200,000,000. When the Senate adopted the $50,000,000 proposition and it went to the House, the final wording adopted by the conferees made it possible for the $200,000,000, which was in the original proposal, to be made available. But there was some question in the beginning as to whether the $50,000,000 was not all that could be obtained. The Department of Justice held that it would be 10 per cent of the remaining $1,500,000,000 as well as the $50,000,000 out of the direct appropriation of $500,000,000.

It was stated by representatives of the Department of Agriculture that the $50,000,000 was a mere bagatelle. After the amount was increased to $200,000,000 they said it was entirely too much, and that it would be a physical impossibility to administer it. The money was appropriated to give credit to the farmers who had no other source of credit and who had no other collateral than the current crop which they were then producing. The information has been pretty widely given out that $100,000,000 would be sufficient, and that there will be taken from the $200,000,000, the other $100,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing $50,000,000 worth of wheat and $50,000,000 worth of cotton, and shipping it to some uncompetitive market so as to get rid of the large surplus here. Some of my colleagues may know where on the habitable globe there is an uncompetitive market for $100,000,000 worth of wheat and cotton. It certainly would be an indictment of the traders of the country if there should be found such a market that they had overlooked.

Let us review the history of this matter just a moment. Last year the proposal was made that the Stabilization Board would hold 1,300,000 bales of cotton, which they owned; the cooperatives were to hold 2,000,000 bales of cotton, which they owned; and the bankers were asked in their convention at New Orleans to match it by holding for the interest of the farmer 3,500,000 bales of cotton. That agreement was entered into. It is understood that there is approximately 7,000,000 bales of cotton, which is impounded by the Government and by the patriotic bankers to be held until the 1st day of August, 1932, at which time it will be definitely known how much acreage reduction there is, voluntary and forced. It will be definitely known what the prospect is for probable yield.

That cotton is held out, and the trade, understanding that there are 7,000,000 bales out of the surplus which will not in any event reach the market until August 1 next, has adapted itself to that situation. I am not familiar with the wheat situation, but I interviewed the Farm Board, and found that they had entered into an agreement or had a gentleman's understanding with the trade that they were to dispose of the surplus wheat in stated amounts at stated times. My memory is not very positive, but I venture it that about what was agreed upon was that 5,000,000 bushels per month is to be so disposed of. The trade has adjusted itself to that condition. Now comes the proposal to take out of the surplus 1,250,000 bales of cotton and 150,000,000 bushels of wheat and dump it on the market wherever a place can be found on credit, risking whether or not the Government will be reimbursed but furnishing the board with $100,000,000 purchase money.

That in a word is what has been proposed. What is the result? Wheat has broken between 7 and 10 cents a bushel. The trade has adjusted itself to the understanding that 5,000,000 bushels a month would be put upon the market. Here comes a proposal to dump on the market somewhere, somehow 150,000,000 bushels of wheat. The trade was adjusting itself to the impounding of the cotton, with a definite time fixed at which they as well as the Government would have more light on the situation, and here comes a proposition to take 1,250,000 bales and turn it loose on the market. The inevitable result of this agitation has been to break the price of cotton and the price of wheat.

In justice to myself I want to say that when the proposal was made to me I said in the first place that I would never agree to have one dollar of this farm production fund diverted from the object for which it was appropriated. It was appropriated for the purpose of giving credit to those who had no other basis of credit except this, and who produced in the aggregate the cheap food and raw material that is converted into finished products at high manufactured prices. Now, to take 50 per cent of that which was appropriated for all the distressed farmers of America and go down and buy that which is impounded and held off the market for their benefit and turn it loose on the market is something that I shall not under any circumstances approve. They want to turn it loose on the market in order to do what? In order to deflate and take from those who are needy $100,000,000.

To everyone who approached me I said the thing was entirely impractical; not only impractical but that it was not good business. It is unthinkable in the present distressed condition, when the Government has invested its money and private individuals have invested their money in order to assure the trade that a great volume of cotton and wheat might not be poured upon the market at the expense of the weak, distressed producer, but held by a strong hand hoping for a time when the markets would be in a better condition. Yet now comes the threat that perhaps the entire amount will be dumped on the market somewhere and somehow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am afraid the able Senator from South Carolina has forgotten something this morning. He should remember the monumental blunder of the administration in forcing upon the country the Farm Board, which was to cure all the ills of the farmer. That monumental blunder having been committed, it is uncharitable for us now not to try to cover it up and help the administration get out of a hole. Let us take the money away from those who produce and appropriate it for the purpose of relieving the Farm Board of its difficulties and to help cover up its maladministration.

Mr. SMITH. That question will be thoroughly discussed and thoroughly threshed out when we conclude the investigation, which has already been ordered before the committee, as to what the Farm Board has done and what everybody else connected with it, both private and public, has done. When we have all the facts we will evaluate and apportion the blame wherever it belongs.

In conclusion I want to state that when this matter was brought to my attention I was amazed that those who had cooperated with myself and others, in the Government and out of the Government, to try to relieve the market of this huge surplus in the way that ultimately might aid the producer, now in this the very crux of the depression should present such a proposition. As I said, it was proposed to take the $100,000,000 out of that which was appropriated by the Government to aid the distressed producer, who was not asking for the money to create more surplus but was asking for enough to keep soul and body together on his farm, to make something for himself and those who were dependent

God knows it was a terrible thing that they were restricted to $400 per family-think of that, Mr. President!-when we were voting $2,000,000,000 in order to keep the prices of stocks and bonds from going down to a point which might jeopardize the dividends of those who made their crops out of dividends. What a pitiable thing that under those conditions we were not willing to give the farmer a tithe, $200,-000,000 out of the $2,000,000,000, for those who feed and clothe us and they who have been cut down to $400 per

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. I yield. Mr. BLACK. The Senator says that some one came to him and made an effort to divert this fund which was appropriated for the purpose of aiding small farmers. Is the Senator willing to state who it was that attempted to divert

Mr. SMITH. I have been approached by members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Mr. Dawes spoke to me on the subject and Mr. Harvey Couch spoke to me. The Secretary of Agriculture has not yet done me the honor to do so, but in the press he has, over his signature, stated that he wanted $100,000,000 of this fund for the purpose of diverting it to buying cotton and wheat.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator if the object of that is to dump a large portion of the existing wheat and cotton on the market and thereby further to depress the price?

Mr. SMITH. The mere agitation of the subject, the mere discussion of it, as I stated in the beginning of what I have had to say, has broken the price of wheat something like 10 cents a bushel and the price of cotton something like half a cent a pound. I am amazed at the proposition even being discussed, in view of the obvious disastrous effect upon the market and the consequent discouragement of every wheat and cotton grower in America its discussion would cause.

I hope, Mr. President, that Congress will take cognizance of this effort and see to it that not one dollar shall be appropriated for the purpose of putting on the market a commodity that it was agreed should be impounded.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS ON PROPOSED WHEAT AND COTTON LEGISLATION

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the fact that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] last Monday, the 21st instant, introduced his new bill (S. 4168) to regulate the sale of wheat owned or financed and controlled by the Federal Farm Board, and for other purposes. He also introduced a similar bill. Senate bill 4167. relative to cotton. I wish to announce that hearings will be held upon those bills just as soon as a date for that purpose can be arranged.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the pending amendment, as I said last Monday, proposes fundamentally to change the division of Federal-aid funds. The Federal aid act, which was passed in 1916 after many years of agitation and discussion, provides that Federal aid shall be apportioned among the States according to area, population, and mileage of post roads. This amendment proposes that the money shall be apportioned according to population only. The proposal was presented to the House of Representatives and was rejected there. The amendment should also be rejected by the Senate. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sure the Senator from Arizona does not mean to say that that matter was presented to the House of Representatives and rejected?

Mr. HAYDEN. I distinctly remember reading in the Congressional Record that there was debate on this very proposal in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BINGHAM. The proposal was before the House, but before there was any debate on it the occupant of the chair at the time, the House being in Committee of the Whole, ruled that it was out of order. Therefore there was no opportunity to take a vote on it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I stand corrected. I now realize that the Senator from Connecticut is right in that statement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I can summarize my objections to this so-called unemployment relief bill in a very few sentences.

First, it seriously belies its title. It is not primarily an unemployment relief bill at all. It uses unemployment relief as an excuse to launch a new highway program for the States, exclusively at present Federal expense. It is 95 per cent highway and 5 per cent relief. That is my first objection. The bill is not what it pretends, and what the people of the country will be given to believe it promises.

Second, if it aims at unemployment relief, Mr. President, it should frankly admit it by a change in its allocation of its funds so as to send these funds proportionately where the unemployment exists. Instead of that, its method of distribution actually penalizes those States with the heaviest unemployment burden. This amazing challenge will not be controverted. My own analysis of the arithmetic of the bill confirms the prejudicial conclusions already submitted by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Bing-Mam] which prove the distribution to be wholly inequitable. My own figures, Mr. President, show that 13 States which suffer 67 per cent of the contemporary unemployment will pay 84 per cent of the appropriation involved in this bill and then get back but 32 per cent of the bounty. A pretty bargain indeed for the unemployed!

Ordinarily comparisons of this nature are invidious and inappropriate, and I would never normally make them, but this is supposed to be an unemployment relief measure. Bear that in mind. It is relevant, therefore, and competent and conclusively material to understand that the States with the greatest unemployment will suffer an actual net loss in their unemployment resources, if this bill should be passed. That is my second objection. My own State of Michigan, for example, will be several million dollars worse off in its net resources with which to meet its own unemployment problem, if this bill becomes a law.

Third, if this bill be taken for what it actually is, namely, a new and extended Federal-aid highway subsidy on a basis of unprecedented generosity for the benefit of some of the States at the expense of others, then it is entirely unjustified in the face of the existing $2,000,000,000 Federal deficit which we have not as yet conquered. This bill wipes out in one stroke at least eight times all the heroic economies ordered by the Senate in its recommital of the last two appropriation bills to the Appropriations Committee. That is the third reason why I am opposed to it. It is reason enough if there were no others.

The amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut will partially correct the inequalities; and then if the Senator from Tennessee, consistent with his attitude on other recent matters, should suggest that the authorization be reduced horizontally 10 per cent, that would better the situation. But even if both amendments were to prevail, the fundamental inequity would still heavily exist, and the fact would still remain that this is inherently a road bill and not an unemployment relief bill, and under the existing fiscal circumstances is not entitled to the approval of the United States Senate. The fact would still remain that the bill would continue actually to penalize the resources of those States which confront the heaviest unemployment problem. The fact would still remain that there is no rational warrant for the present proposed expansion of any such Federalaid program and for the proposed heavy addition to the deficit and thus to the new tax with which this mounting deficit must be met.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be greatly obliged to the Senator from Michigan if he will point out to the Senate the distinction between this bill and the emergency public works bill which became a law on December 20, 1930. That is the act of Congress upon which the pending bill is modeled. What change has there been in the situation whereby, although the Senator could vote in December, 1930, for a Federal-aid highway appropriation, he can not vote for an almost identical proposal now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is precisely the same kind of a bill; but, Mr. President, the situation which the Treasury confronts to-day is totally different.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is that the only objection which the Senator has to the bill?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That plus the fact that the unemployment situation is totally different.

Mr. HAYDEN. Are there fewer unemployed in the United States to-day than there were in 1930?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; but they are concentrated, Mr. President, to-day in even larger measure than ever before in the precise spots from which this bill would take most of its funds without comparable returns to them in any compensatory degree.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I differ absolutely with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in the statement which he has made. We have heard a number of times on this floor recently suggestions that the bill is not equitable. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] has made the statement that the provisions of the bill are not equitable when it comes to distributing unemployment relief over various sections of the country in that the large, populous centers will not get as much benefit as will the smaller communities. That, Mr. President, is not the case, because it has been shown here time and again that from 75 per cent to 90 per cent of every dollar expended on road building goes to labor, and that for every man working on the road two men are employed behind the lines in manufacturing establishments, in making materials that will be used on the roads, in the coal mines and in the oil fields, and so on down the line. So numerous industries will be benefited by the passage of this bill, and a larger proportion of men from the more populous centers will be given employment than has been stated.

Another provision of the bill which will help the unemployment situation in the large centers is the removal of the limitation as to money being expended in towns of over 2,500 population by an amendment in this bill. That will enable cities of size to employ large numbers of men on road-building programs. The limitation of so many dollars per mile has also been removed by an amendment to this bill. This will also help solve the unemployment problem in the larger centers of population.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Hayden] has stated, practically the same problem was before us last year and helped by the emergency road bill which passed, only not in as intense form; there were many men unemployed last year, but to-day there are millions more unemployed. It is necessary to pass this bill in order to start the wheels going and to help get us out of the bad mess in which we are to-day in this whole country.

I do not believe in this eternal pessimism, in constantly saying that we must cut our expenses and close down here and close down there, which will result in throwing tens of thousands more men into the ranks of the unemployed, in creating more suffering, and more distress. Why not have a little bit of optimism and start the wheels of industry turning by putting men to work again instead of shutting down when it is not necessary?

According to the figures we have received, which are reliable, over 800,000 men will be put to work by the passage of this bill, and 2,000,000 people, including the families, will benefit by it. It will mean helping to start the wheels of industry again.

Mr. President, I hope this bill will be passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, during the past two weeks we have heard a great deal about the necessity for balancing the Budget and about the necessity for cutting down appropriations. Within the past 10 days the Senate has twice voted to cut down great appropriation bills which, in the first place, have been carefully studied by the departments: in the second place, by the President, anxious to keep expenses down; in the third place, by the Bureau of the Budget, determined to cut things to the bone; in the fourth place, by the House of Representatives, cutting off here and there a million or more; and, finally, the Senate itself has sent the Interior Department bill and the bill for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor back to the Appropriations Committee with directions to report the bills back to the Senate with an aggregate cut of 10 per cent on the amount allowed by the House.

Unquestionably those actions of the Senate, in which I concurred, will cause a great deal of suffering among the bureaus. They will cause diminution of employment. They will cause loss of certain important governmental activities if made into law; but the Senate, I believe wisely, took the position that in view of the present condition of the National Treasury it must be done. By a vote of 50 to 29 yesterday the Senate took that attitude and sent back to the committee the bill for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor.

To-day we are asked to pass a bill which is intended to provide immediately an expenditure by the Federal Government during the year 1932 of $266,000,000. No one says where this $266,000,000 is to come from. There is no provision in the bill for raising the revenue by taxing automobiles or gasoline or oil or any business that is particularly benefited by the building of the roads. On the one day we cut off from four important branches of the Government 10 per cent of the amount which the House thought they ought to have—and the House is in an economic mood—and on the very next day we are urged to pass a bill to indulge in a road-building orgy to the tune of $266,000,000.

It is true that the bill carries only $120,000,000 for Federal aid to the States and $16,000,000 for Indian trails, forest roads, and so forth; but the object of the $120,000,000 which is to be given to the States is to enable the States to come back to the Federal Government and say, "Now we are ready to take an additional $120,000,000 that you have agreed to give us if we could match it." Talk about this being in line with the original Federal-aid project, the argument made by my distinguished friend from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. Why, Mr. President, if it were not sad, it would be ludicrous to say that we ought to pass this bill because the original Federal-aid project was on this basis.

Under the original plan the Federal Government says to the States, "If you want to spend a lot of your taxpayers' money in building roads in your State we will match it, dollar for dollar, up to a certain amount which has been allowed by Congress.

"If your taxpayers feel that they do not want to be taxed for this purpose; that the roads are good enough to go through the winter or through this year or next year; that they do not want the additional assessment against real estate that would be necessary; that they do not want the State to issue bonds and put additional burdens of paying interest on the citizens of the State, then you need not do it, and you need not have this money, and you need not accept this burden, except that your taxpayers will have to share in paying their part of the general appropriation."

That is the original plan. That is the plan that we have seen go on from year to year. This bill, however, says to the State, "Your taxpayers do not want to match Federal aid. Your taxpayers are overburdened already. Your taxpayers do not want additional bonds issued. Your taxpayers do not want additional assessments placed against real estate. Your taxpayers think that your roads are good enough, and the best they can afford at present. Very well. We will bribe you to put your taxpayers 'in the red' in years to come. Here is some money which you can have from us now with which to induce us to give you some more money which you can spend now, and which later on your taxpayers will raise when they do not know what is happening." In the meantime, this bill says that the Federal Government is ready to spend, in 1932, $266,000,000.

Mr. President, as was pointed out yesterday, during the past 12 months the Federal Government has spent twice as much as it has received. The Treasury Department reports that receipts from taxation from all sources during the 12 months from March 1, 1931, to February 29, 1932, were $2,629,557,267, and the total expenditures during the same period were $5,161,594,000. In other words, during the past 12 months we have been spending twice as much as we have been receiving.

How have we done it? We have done it by borrowing, by putting the burden on the future. We had to do it that way. We could not let our bills go unpaid. So I asked the Treasury Department, "How much borrowing have we been doing? How much borrowing will it be necessary to do before the end of this fiscal year?" The reply is that the probable borrowing of the Federal Government during the fiscal year 1932, ending June 30 of this year, is $2,575,-000,000. Two billion five hundred and seventy-five million dollars will have to be borrowed in this fiscal year, and in the last fiscal year we had to borrow $900,000,000! In other words, by the end of this fiscal year we will probably have borrowed three and a half billion dollars, which the taxpayers of the United States will eventually have to pay and on which they will have to pay interest until the principal is paid.

With that staggering burden in front of us, Mr. President, the proposal offered here to-day suggests that we borrow $266,000,000 more—that is only a little amount, just a mere bagatelle in the face of the amount we have already borrowed—in order, forsooth, to give immediate relief to unemployment! I may mention that that $266,000,000 is a million dollars a day for the next nine months, and it has to be met by borrowing. It can not possibly be met by additional taxes. The House of Representatives to-day is struggling with proposals as to how it is going to raise additional taxes so that we may somewhere nearly balance the Budget. They have not yet succeeded in solving the problem.

In view of this, it does seem to me that this is no time to go ahead with the road program. It does seem to me that it is extremely bad policy to go far beyond what the Government has ever done before in handing out with one hand and putting in the pockets of the States the money which they can transfer to the other hand and come back to us and let us pass it out on that side. In other words, we take $120,000,000 out of this pocket and say to the States, "Now, you just hand it back to us here, and we will double it and give to you $240,000,000 out of that pocket." It is a hocuspocus. It is based on the fact that there are millions of unemployed, and we would like to give them employment.

If we could have this bill in such form that the expenditure would be equally divided among the States in proportion to the numbers of their unemployed, the bill might have some justification, although even in that case, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg] has eloquently pointed out, the States that would have to pay the bill eventually would receive only one-half of the benefits from it. It is far cheaper for them, far better for their taxpayers, to raise that money and use it to employ their own unemployed than to give it to the Federal Government to distribute among the States that pay the smaller part of the taxes.

I do not intend at this time to discuss further the distribution of the taxes and the distribution of the expenditures; but I do want to call attention to the fact which I mentioned the other day, that unemployment is distributed throughout the United States very closely in proportion to population. The percentage of the total unemployed in various States is about the percentage of the population of those States to the total population of the Union. That is not entirely accurate; but it is a very much fairer method of considering this matter than the one in the bill now before us.

Under the bill now before us, the relief obtained by the laboring men whom the Senator from Nevada pictures as wanting to work on the roads and work in the transportation department behind the roads, and so forth, is extremely inequitable. According to the figures received from the governors about the amount of unemployment which they calculate now in their States, the State of Arizona, so ably represented by the Senator who has just addressed us, would receive $88 per capita-or twice that amount when they have matched the Federal aid with this money that the Government is supposed to let them have in order that they may match the other side of the bill. Compare the $88 which Arizona gets under this bill with $9 which California gets and $9 which Connecticut gets, with $5 which Illinois gets, with $21 which new Hampshire gets, with $32 which New York gets, with $5 which Pennsylvania gets. There are other States where the contrast is far more striking. For instance, the State of Nevada gets for its unemployed a per capita allowance of $631 as contrasted with Illinois's $5, and Pennsylvania's $5, and Connecticut's $9.

If this amendment is adopted, it will make a difference in the distribution of the money; and that distribution has been worked out in the House by Mr. Ketcham, who originally offered this amendment which was ruled out of order and may be found on page 4861 of the Record. Perhaps it will interest some to know exactly what difference it makes.

If the amendment is adopted and the money is distributed in accordance with population, Alabama will receive a little more than under the present law. Under the present law, she would receive $2,550,000; and under the proportion by population she would receive $2,640,000.

Arizona, naturally, would receive far less. Under the present law, she would receive $1,762,000. If divided in accordance with population, she would get only $480,000, or $1,300,000 less.

California would get a little bit more. Under the present law, she would get $4,600,000. If divided according to population, she would get $5,520,000.

Colorado would get very much less. Under the present law, she would get $2,255,000. If divided according to population, she would get $960,000.

I shall ask that this table be printed in the Record; so I will not read all the figures, but only call attention to one or two of the more striking ones.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The table is as follows:

Amount each State would receive of an apportionment of $120,-000,000, using the percentages of the regular 1933 apportionment, also taxes paid and population

Mr. BINGHAM. In Illinois, where the governor has told us there are nearly 1,000,000 people out of work, the amount under the present law would be $5,000,000. If divided according to population, it would be $7,440,000—additional relief of $2,400,000.

In Michigan, under the present law, the amount received would be $3,783,000. Michigan, incidentally, would have had to pay into the Federal Treasury, to meet this, about $6,000,000. Under the present law, however, she would get $3,783,000. Under a distribution according to population she would get $4,680,000, or nearly $1,000,000 more.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And may I emphasize again at that point the thing which the Senator himself has so specifically stated many times: Under either method of allocation, although Michigan is a State which suffers maximum unemployment, its net resources with which to meet its unemployment problem would be less after this bill is passed than before.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct, Mr. President. For every dollar that she raises toward this fund she will get back only 50 cents for her own use.

The State of New York, which pays such a very large share of the taxes, would receive a very considerable increased benefit under the proposed amendment. Under the bill it would get $6,000,000; under the proposed amendment it would get $12,360,000, or more than twice as much.

The very fact that out of the same amount of money it is possible for one State to get an additional $6,000,000 shows how many States would get far more than they are entitled , to, under an equitable division of the money in accordance with their population.

The State of Pennsylvania under the bill would get $5,-261,000; under the amendment it would get $9,360,000, or more than $4,000,000 more. We have been told by the governor of that State that there are nearly a million unemployed in the State of Pennsylvania.

In other words, if this is an unemployment relief measure. if it is felt that we can afford to add to our burdens by expending $266,000,000 more this year for unemployment relief, it ought to be divided in such a way that it will reach the unemployment fairly equitably throughout the United States, and not be divided in such a way that some States, on the basis of the idea on which Federal aid is generally divided, shall get ten, fifteen, or twenty times as much relief as other States where there is a very great deal of unemployment.

The other day I called attention to some interesting figures which I should like to repeat, since we are now debating the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield for that purpose?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I would like to say, for the benefit of some of the Senators who have recently come into the Chamber, that if they are interested in seeing what a difference it would make to their States if this amendment which I have proposed, to distribute the fund according to population, were adopted, they will find in the Congressional Record, on page 4861, a table showing. in the center column, how the money would be distributed under the bill as it passed the House and as it is before us, and in the final column the way in which the money would be distributed if the amendment which I have proposed were adopted. I would like to repeat a few of the comparisons which I used the other day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will not the Senator have that tabulation printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BINGHAM. I asked to have it printed in the RECORD, because I thought it would be interesting to all Senators.

In working out the unfairness of this bill, as it seems to me, although not, of course, to those who are interested in getting it passed, I discovered that in the apportionment of the fund proposed to be appropriated Arizona would receive 1.4 per cent, or four and a half times as much as she would be entitled to if the distribution were made according to her unemployed. On the other hand, the State of Michigan, with 6.2 per cent of the total unemployed, would receive only 3 per cent of the relief fund, or less than onehalf of what she is entitled to. To put it the other way around, the unemployed in Arizona per capita would get eight times as much relief as would the unemployed in Michigan. Yet, as the Senator from Michigan has pointed out, Michigan would have to pay more than twice as much into the fund as she would get out of it.

Kansas has nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the total unemployed in the United States. Under this bill she would receive 2.6 per cent of the relief fund, or three times as much as she would be entitled to if the fund were distributed according to the number of unemployed.

Massachusetts, on the other hand, with 5.1 per cent of the unemployed, would receive only 1.4 per cent of the relief, or less than one-third of what she would be entitled to under the distribution of the fund in accordance with the number of unemployed. Kansas would get nine times as much relief under this measure as would Massachusetts.

Tennessee has nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the total unemployed. Under this measure she would get 2.1 per cent of the relief, or more than twice as much as she would be entitled to if the funds were distributed according to the number of unemployed.

Contrast this with Rhode Island, which has 1.1 per cent of the total unemployed, and would receive only five-tenths of 1 per cent of the relief, or one-half of what she is entitled In other words, Tennessee would get four times as much relief as would the State of Rhode Island.

Nevada has one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total unemployed, but under this bill would get 1.3 per cent of the relief, or thirteen times as much as she would be entitled to according to the number of unemployed.

Connecticut has 1.6 per cent of the unemployed and receives 0.6 per cent of the relief fund, or only about onethird of that to which she is entitled.

The bill is unfair and unjust. It gives the least help to the communities that need it most. It ought not to pass.

During the delivery of Mr. BINGHAM's speech,

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to have placed in the RECORD a statement which the State highway commissioner of Michigan recently made before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in regard to highway legislation in Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield for that purpose?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection, Mr. President. I ask that it may be placed at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so or-

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL AID HIGHWAY LEGISLATION

United States Senate, Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads Washington, D. C., January 19, 1932.

The committee met, pursuant to call, in the committee room, Capitol Building, at 2 o'clock p. m., Senator TASKER L. ODDIE, chairman, presiding.

Present: Senators Oddie (chairman). Frazier, Hebert, Capper, White, Barbour, McKellar, Hayden, McGill, Balley, Bankhead, Bulow, Byrnes, and Logan.

The Chairman. We will proceed now.

Mr. Markham. Mr. Chairman and Senators, our next witness is Mr. G. C. Dillman, State highway commissioner of Michigan, who will speak to you on some of the work of the State highway departments as it might affect the Federal situation.

STATEMENT OF G. C. DILLMAN, STATE HIGHWAY COMMISSIONER OF MICHIGAN

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ODDIE). We will be glad to have a statement from you, Mr. Dillman.

Mr. Dillman. I have a statement here, Mr. Chairman, covering the policies of the American Association of State Highways. This was adopted at the annual meeting of the association in November, 1930, which is strictly up to date. This statement is as

"In general it may be stated that approximately 10 per cent of the public-road mileage in the several States composes the combined Federal-aid and State systems, which may be called primary roads, and an additional 20 to 25 per cent composes the principal county trunk or State-aid highways, which may be called secondary roads, and the remaining 65 to 70 per cent composes purely local township or third-class roads.

"(a) That it is the sense of this association that until such time to the above defined primary routes have reached an advanced as the above-defined primary routes have reached an advanced stage of improvement Federal funds exclusively and the major portion of State funds should be used entirely to expedite work on this system.

on this system.

"(b) That when the present designated Federal-aid systems have been improved in an advanced degree advantage should then be taken of the provision of the Federal highway act to increase the mileage of the Federal-aid system, upon which Federal-aid funds can be used, by applying said Federal money to what might now be considered secondary roads.

"(c) That when the primary routes have reached a reasonably advanced state of improvement, in keeping with traffic demands, then the States should recognize their responsibility to traffic on the secondary system of highways, or county trunk highways, which supplement the general traffic and farm-to-market service of the primary routes, and the States should stimulate such improvement by the allocation of a definite and reasonable proportion of State-collected funds for such secondary system of highways or county trunk highways; if the State has not as yet made such funds available for such systems.

"(d) That the expenditure, however, of all such State funds allotted for the improvement of the secondary systems or county

"(d) That the expenditure, however, of all such State funds allotted for the improvement of the secondary systems or county trunk highways should be made with such State supervision as will insure tangible, well-planned, worth-while improvements, all administered on a sound business and economical basis.

"(e) That where State trunk highways, roads of the secondary system, or county trunk highways pass through municipalities, funds available for the improvement of such routes may logically be used under proper supervision for the construction and maintenance of such routes through such municipalities, but such funds should not become available to the municipalities to be used on thoroughfares which are not used by the traffic carried on such routes." on such routes.'

on such routes."

The tendency is toward State and county as the smallest road building, maintaining, and administering units.

I might cite the State of North Carolina, where on July 1, 1931, all roads were added to the State highway system. Other States which control in whole or in part the county road systems are Illinois, Maine, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania, a total of seven. This last year Pennsylvania added 20,000 miles of rural highways to the State highway systems.

States which aid the counties with or without supervision of expenditures by the State highway department are Alabama. Arie States which aid the counties with or without supervision of expenditures by the State highway department are Alabama, Arlzona, Arkansas, California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming. Also in Michigan for 1932 the counties take over 20 per cent of the township roads, being 12,000 miles, and 20 per cent each year until all have been added to the county road system. This makes a total of 36 States which aid the counties.

being 12,000 miles, and 20 per cent each year until all have been added to the county road system. This makes a total of 36 States which aid the counties.

Thirteen States aid the townships with or without supervision of expenditures, these being Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Virginia, and Wisconsin.

Twenty-one States aid the cities of certain populations or on certain streets. This is true at least of some of these villages and cities. The States I refer to are Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New Mexico, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Vermont, Washington, and Wisconsin.

In seven of these States counties may or do control road work in townships or towns—Arkansas, California, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, New Jersey, Ohio.

In 25 States the county is the smallest unit for road responsibility, these States being Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Idaho, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

West Virginia, and Wyoming.

There are many advantages that are gained in State and county centralized control over all roads.

I would like to discuss briefly a few advantages that have proven

I would like to discuss briefly a few advantages that have proven out in these cases the functions of the State and county highway department are road improvements in a degree commensurate with traffic importance and adequate maintenance.

The State's and county's best engineering, training, and experience, also laboratory facilities, have been made available for the road problems of all sections.

There has been concentrated into one or a comparatively few reproduce secretary of the motor vehicle and gasoline to.

spending agencies control of the motor vehicle and gasoline tax. In the case of Michigan, when the township roads are taken over, we will have 1,376 less administering units of rural highways than we now have with the township system.

A burden of millions of dollars annually has been lifted from the property tax and the transfer of the responsibility for the future development of local roads from the local government to the county or State.

The decision of road problems is now based on the result of factual surveys developed by trained forces.

The expenditures are subjected to the analysis of accurate cost records and budget control, impossible in so many small subdivisions. The use of heavy and expensive equipment owned is idle much of the time.

The expediting of road improvement, the probability of better maintenance and increased efficiency of administration.

This brings me to the point I wish to make, that Federal aid for highways should be confined strictly to the State highway systems, which embody the Federal highway systems, as it is or may be extended. Any aid to the county or township roads should come from the States. As an example of highway laws that I believe follows out good practice and the policy of the American Association of State Highway Officials, let me sketch briefly the Michigan law as it is carried out.

Senator Byrnes. What is the relevancy of the discussion as to the wisdom of aid between States and counties to this bill here or to the amendment? I am interested, but so far as the highways policy of the laws in the respective States, this committee has no jurisdiction over them and could not handle them. Is there any particular relevance?

particular relevance?

The CHAIRMAN. I did not know what Mr. Dillman was going to testify to, but the idea was to make as complete a picture as possible of existing conditions.

Mr. Dillman. I think in not to exceed five minutes I can cover the ground. The point I am trying to make is to show the trend in highway development from the smaller unit to the larger unit.

Mr. Dillman. I think in not to exceed five minutes I can cover the ground. The point I am trying to make is to show the trend in highway development from the smaller unit to the larger unit. As to the case of Michigan, the highway laws applied conform very closely to the policy of the Association of State Highway Departments. In this case the State highway system has approximately 8,100 miles, being 10 per cent of the public road mileage of the State. The county road system of about 16,000 miles, or per cent of approximately 60,000 miles of township roads, amounting to 12,000 miles, or added to the county roads, amounting to 12,000 miles, or added to the county roads.

State refunds equivalent to one-half of weight or license tax to counties toward support of county roads.

In addition, $2,000,000 toward support of the 20 per cent township roads taken over this year, and half a million increase each year until $4,000,000 is paid to the county, when all township roads have been absorbed into county systems.

The State pays 50 per cent or more toward construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of all roads and bridges on trunk lines and Federal routes in cities and villages of the State.

That is merely cited as an example of one State that is carrying on a policy that we believe is entirely sound, and is merely the trend of the States throughout the country.

The Charraman. What is the effect of this legislation on the unemployment problem in your State?

Mr. Dillman. I might say that about the 20th of last October we put on a very extensive winter construction program, totaling $11,500,000 of work, which necessarily was confined to work to be done during the late fall and winter months, consisting of grading, widening, drain structures, bridges, some gravel surfacing, and the work was all either carried on through the highway department organization, through the county, or largely by contract, which, by the way, we will receive $2,000,000 of Federal ald out of $11,500,000 to spend, and each of those jobs was week, or every other week, in order to take care of more men than on the full-time basis.

Michigan is one of the States that has a very serious unemployment condition, and we have found in the past two and a half months that this has worked out very successfully, and the State is contributing something in this highway work to the relief of the unemployed, at the same time relieving the counties, cities, villages, and townships of a very material amount in welfare work. I am citing that as an example of one of many States which are carrying on highway work for the benefit of labor largely at this time.

The Chairman. What are you doing at the present time, and what regulations do you have in reference to making the road program go as far as possible in meeting the human needs of the program go as lar as possible in meeting the numan needs of the laborer?

Mr. Dillman. We are establishing, as I said, the minimum wage and 8-hour day, one-half time for these men. We are specifying certain equipment that the contractor may use on the job, and that is specified. He knows that when he bids on the work, and we are trying to utilize the maximum amount of labor on the work, without cutting materially into the efficiency of handling the work, and we do know in putting on several million dollars of this work during November and December, also early in January, that the costs have been very little more than we had during the last half of the year 1931, when there were no regulations involving labor. The Charman. What is your idea about the bill that is before the committee now, and the various provisions of it?

Mr. Dillman. I feel the bill before the committee is a bill which should be passed. We are heartly in favor of it and heartly approve of it. I am speaking for some of the States, directly for Michigan, and we are very much in favor of the legislation.

The Charman. Are the States in your section of the country able to meet the authorization under this law?

Mr. Dillman. Yes, sir; Michigan is one of the Central Northern able to meet the authorization under this law?

Mr. Dillman. Yes, sir; Michigan is one of the Central Northern States that has no difficulty whatever in meeting this, and I am quite sure that there is not a State in that part of the Union that has any difficulty in meeting the Federal aid. In our case it amounts to only about 20 per cent of the expenditures for construction on the State and Federal system this year.

The Chairman. Would the members of the committee like to ask any further questions?

Senator HAYDEN. Do you specify in your contracts the rate of wages that the contractor shall pay?

Mr. Dillman. We specify in the work—that is, we have since last October, in putting on the winter program; we are continuing that now on work that will be seasonal. This year we are setting up for common labor a minimum wage of 35 cents an hour. That is as far as we are going in setting up wages.

Senator HAYDEN. Does the contractor, when he makes a contract with the State agree to pay that minimum wage?

with the State, agree to pay that minimum wage?

Mr. DILLMAN. Yes, sir; it is checked continually by our engineers in charge of each of these jobs.

Senator HAYDEN. It is not a question of law, or regulation, but would be a breach of contract if the contractor did not pay the agreed minimum wage?
Mr. Dillman. That is part of his contract.

Senator Hayden. With respect to the emergency appropriation of $80,000,000 made by Congress in December, 1930, did the State of Michigan make good use of that additional money?

of Michigan make good use of that additional money?

Mr. Dillman. Yes; our portion of that was $2,500,000, and that money was all spent. We have already received that back from the Government, and we made very good use of it and feel the money was well spent. It was spent on construction of the Federal system, and, in addition to that, we have shown our interest in it by going much further in putting up State money on the Federal system, and we have found the 1931 work, throughout the year, that for every $1,000,000 we are spending on State highway work, which includes grading, drainage, surfacing, bridges, paving—for every $1,000,000 from 2,500 to 3,000 men are employed during the contract.

Senator Hayden. Do you believe it would be desirable for Congress to do the same thing it did last year? I am not referring to the amount of money to be appropriated, but is it desirable that Congress repeat its action with respect to emergency highway appropriations?

appropriations?

Mr. Dillman. I feel that is a matter that Congress knows so well, the condition of the country, etc., the matter of employment and financial obligations that must be met, and the demands upon Congress, that it is something that I think you men are best able of anyone in the country to pass on. As far as Michigan is con-cerned, I believe it is true with all States; we stand ready to step in and spend any reasonable amount of money appropriated. We believe we can well spend it and get value received, and it will help labor.

Senator Hayden. Is there any doubt in your mind that money appropriated by Congress in that manner can be immediately used to put men to work?

Mr. Dillman. There is no doubt about it whatever in my mind that the money can be taken up without any undue effort on the part of the States and very wisely spent on the Federal highway system, which is a big part of the total State system, and it will be of material help to labor.

Senator Hayden. Has your State highway department studied the problem of an expansion of Federal-aid road work, and has it prepared plans and specifications for such work?

Mr. Dillman, Yes.

prepared plans and specifications for such work?

Mr. DILLMAN. Yes.
Senator Hayden. They are ready so that they could put men to work if the money was made available?

Mr. DILLMAN. Yes, sir.
Senator Hayden. I took the liberty of addressing the Senate to-day on this subject. You will find my remarks in the Record to-morrow morning. It is very important that we consider any emergency road appropriation as within a balanced Federal Budget. emergency road appropriation as within a balanced Federal Budget. It may not be proper for me to ask the witness whether Congress should or should not take action that would affect the Federal Budget, but I think it is proper to ask Mr. Dillman whether emergency funds advanced in this manner will accomplish the purpose of Congress, which is to provide work for the unemployed. Senator McKellar. That is immediately.

Senator Hayden. Immediately.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your idea of the advantages of providing for authorizations a number of years in advance? How does that affect the work of the State highway department?

Mr. Dillman. It affects the work very materially in this way.

that affect the work of the State highway department?

Mr. Dillman. It affects the work very materially in this way, that a State highway department can function efficiently, and work can be expedited and carried on with the least effort, getting the best results, by knowing a year or two, at least, in advance as to what will be expected of that department, and I know in the case of the State of Michigan; I know it is true with a great many States, they are working on the basis of a program of work, when you come to consider the local involvements in putting the work on a possible relocation and changing existing conditions, acquire rights of way, surveys, and plans, that takes time, anywhere from a minimum of six months to possibly a year or two in getting those things ironed out, and when we know we have a going program, and that there will be certain demands made on the department, the work can be administered much smoother a going program, and that there will be certain demands made on the department, the work can be administered much smoother and in much better shape. In our case, at least, if that money had not been available, we would not have been ready to take up the Federal loan last year, and we went ahead with little extra effort and took it up, because plans were ready to proceed with.

The CHAIRMAN. In laying out the road system, you were placed in a better position because of having a comparatively long program mapped out some years in advance?

Mr. DILLMAN. Yes, sir. The State highway system should not and could not be extended without reasonable assurance at least that there are going to be funds for financing the work.

Senator Byrnes. The statement was made this morning on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Utah, as I recall, that there was a disposition on the part of some of the States to ask that the States be not required to repay the emergency appropriation. Have you heard from any of the representatives of your association here at this time any statements showing a disposition on the part of States to avoid the reimbursement to the Federal Government of the emergency appropriation which was advanced DILLMAN. No, sir; I have heard no statement to that effect. Speaking as the commissioner from Michigan, I would say we are certainly more than willing and glad and feel we could not act in certainly more than willing and glad and feel we could not act in good faith without first subscribing to the plan we knowingly went into, that this money was to be paid back.

Senator Byrnes. One other question. Are you familiar with the statement which was handed to the committee yesterday by Mr. Markham showing the approximate cost per mile of roads constructed in 1931? Are you familiar with that table?

Mr. DILLMAN. I do not recall the table.

Senator Byrnes. The statement made with reference to that table is this, that it shows upon its face an approximate cost of $25,000 per mile for projects under consideration, which projects included not only macadam roads but sand-clay and surface-treated roads. Is it a fact that there was an expenditure throughout the country of approximately $25,000 per mile for such roads?

Mr. DILLMAN. I am not able to answer that question from the average of all types. As far as Michigan costs are concerned, which are largely paving projects, building about 350 or 400 miles a year, are largely paving projects, building about 350 or 400 miles a year, that will run in 1931 in the neighborhood of $25,000 to $27,000 per mile for 20-foot paving, including grading and all necessary work.

Senator Byrnes. You say that was 1931?

Mr. Dillman. Yes; although we have some projects that cost from $50,000 to $75,000 a mile, on quite lengthy jobs, but this is the average of all the work.

Senator Byrnes. Senator McKellar understood the statement as Senator Byrnes. Senator McKellar understood the statement as indicating a cost of approximately $25,000 a mile, eliminating the cost of bridges, and I think we wanted to know whether that understanding was correct or not?

Mr. Markham. I think you are referring to one of the tables I prepared, and I sat opposite the Senator. The column of total expenditures is not the expenditures for construction only, and therefore you can not take the miles constructed in 1931 and compare it with the dollars expended. That is the total expenditures for everything, and includes $191,000,000 for the maintenance of the roads, besides the interest on the bonds and bonds retired. This is the total expenditure of the highway department for everything. I will have for you within the next 30 days a complete statement as to what each State paid for construction, as well as maintenance and retirement of bonds.

Senator Byrnes. I simply wanted you to straighten it in the records, and I wish you would put in what the average cost per mile in the State of Tennessee was.

Mr. Markham I told the Senator I would try to get him that Mr. Markham. I told the Senator I would try to get him that information. This is the column of total expenditures, and not for construction only.

Senator Hayden. Let me ask the witness whether the cost of material and supplies used in road construction was less in 1931 than it has been in previous years.

Mr. Dullama Less in 1931 as far as my State is concerned. It

Mr. Dillman. Less in 1931, as far as my State is concerned. It is materially less than it was in previous years. Take the average cost of a gravel road or a macadam—we have very little macadam, some concrete, and asphalt—that would run about 25 per cent under the cost of about three or four years before that.

The Chairman. That was a statement I made based upon information I received from Mr. MacDonald, that throughout the United States the cost of road construction in 1931 is approximately 25 per cent less than it was in the 1925 to 1929 period. Is that your experience in Michigan?

perience in Michigan's Mr. Dillman. Yes, sir; that is right. The Chairman. Are there any further questions of the witness?

If not, that will be all, thank you.

Mr. Markham, do you have another witness?

Mr. Markham. Yes; Mr. Z. E. Sevison, president of the Western Association of State Highway Officials and State highway engineer of Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN, Mr. Sevison, we will be glad to have a statement from you.

After the conclusion of Mr. BINGHAM's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

THE CALENDAR-TREATIES

The legislative clerk announced No. 5, Executive KK (70th Cong., 2d sess.), a treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights between the United States and Norway, signed at Washington on June 5, 1928, and an additional article thereto signed at Washington on February 25, 1929.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my understanding is that the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] is not ready to proceed with the consideration of this treaty to-day, so I will ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The legislative clerk announced Executive A (72d Cong., 1st sess.), a treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights between the United States and the Republic of Poland, signed at Washington on June 15, 1931.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that that, too, may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY-CHARLES A. JONAS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina, reported adversely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina is before the Senate on an adverse report from the Committee on the Judiciary. As a member of the subcommittee submitting to the general committee an adverse report, I venture to offer to the Senate the reasons which actuated the committee in its action in the

There seems to be no serious question about the ability of Mr. Jonas as a lawyer nor as to his general character. both respects he is attested by many letters filed with the committee from residents of his State, members of the bar, both Democrats and Republicans. The objection rests upon some contributions which he made to the newspapers of his State deemed by the two Senators from the State of North Carolina to be a serious reflection upon a member of the Senate, upon a committee of the Senate, upon the Senate itself, and upon the courts of the State of North Carolina.

Mr. Jonas was elected a Member of the House of Representatives in the campaign of 1928 and served from the 4th of March, 1929, until the 4th of March, 1931. He was defeated for reelection in the campaign of 1930. He ran on both occasions as a Republican candidate for Member of Congress. He informed the committee that he began life as a Democrat, but, either perceiving the error of his ways or upon some other consideration, he joined the Bull Moose Party and subsequently became converted to the true tenets of Republicanism and ran as a Republican candidate on the occasion referred to

However, he was defeated and then nominated for this position by the President some time before the 4th of March, 1931, when he was to retire as a Member of the House from his district. At that time he was opposed by the present senior Senator from the State of North Carolina [Mr. Mor-RISON], whose objection was sufficient to carry the nomination over the session. Mr. Jonas was again nominated by the President, having meanwhile been given a recess appointment, and is now strenuously opposed by both of the Senators from that State for the reasons to which I have heretofore adverted.

It will be recalled that during the summer preceding the election of 1930 a committee was appointed, as had been customary in anticipation of congressional elections for quite a number of years, to inquire into campaign expenditures, expenditures made in the promotion of elections, of which committee the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NyE] was made chairman. Similarly, anticipating the election of 1928, a committee was appointed, of which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Steiwer], as my recollection now serves me, was chairman, and for the election of 1926 the famous Reed committee was appointed, of which the former Senator from Missouri, James A. Reed, was chairman,

In the pursuit of the duties of the first-mentioned committee the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NyE] visited the State of North Carolina and apparently learned of nothing that transpired in the election in that State which seemed to be worthy of very serious attention from his committee. Nevertheless he aroused the antipathy of Mr. Jonas, who, on January 13, 1931, caused to be published in the Greensboro Daily News an article which apparently had been quite deliberately prepared, in which he stated as Representatives of the Nye committee continued to assemble evidence of alleged fraud in the 1930 primary and general election in North Carolina. What the committee will finally do about the North Carolina situation no one seems to know. I have never met or spoken to Senator Nye or any other member of the committee in my life. I have never believed Senator Nye intends to seriously investigate the North Carolina case if he can help it.

If the Democrats did not pay him to come to the State and without any serious effort to secure evidence give out a statement that the situation in the State is "refreshing" then they without any serious effort to secure evidence give out a statement that the situation in the State is "refreshing," then they at least owe him a debt of gratitude. Never was there a plainer case of an attempt to whitewash. As an investigation, his conduct in the State was painful, pitiful, and puerile. He is a fiend for publicity, as are all the sleepy-eyed, dreamy "sons of wild jackasses" in the Senate. He could cuff old Vare and other regular Republicans around with impunity, and the press and politicians, including those in North Carolina, would rollick with glee and bid him "Lay on, Macduff"; but when he came to North Carolina and innocently asked those charged with fraud whether they had been naughty, he got not only a frost and newspaper reminder that he had no business "meddling with our affairs," but also a fatherly lecture from the witness stand to the effect that North Carolina has a hundred counties, and, after all, $100,000 is not an enormous sum as election matters go. $100,000 is not an enormous sum as election matters go

The letter continues to the effect that gross frauds were perpetrated in the North Carolina election, and that it was useless to attempt to secure any redress whatever or correction of those evils through the courts of North Carolina. The imputation thus extended is quite sternly resented by the Senators from North Carolina; but I pass that for such consideration as they may care to give it.

I digress to remark, however, in this connection that whatever frauds may have occurred in the election in North Carolina, Mr. Jonas tells us they had no relation whatever to the matter of the expenditure of money. He makes no contention whatever that there was any undue expenditure of money or any unlawful expenditure of money in the State of North Carolina.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. Mr. REED. If I correctly heard the Senator, there was an imputation of a possible payment of money to Senator Nye. Would the Senator be so good as to read that sentence again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. The sentence reads:

I have never believed Senator Nyz intends to seriously investigate the North Carolina case if he can help it. If the Democrats did not pay him to come to the State and, without any serious effort to secure evidence, give out a statement that the situation in the State is "refreshing," then they at least owe him a debt of gratitude.

I place my opposition to Mr. Jonas upon that statement and upon that statement alone, and I advert to the other matters by way of explanation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield for another question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not mean that any of the other criticism against Senator NyE is not within the proper field of criticism to which any public official may be subjected?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Except in this regard: Any criticism that might be directed against Senator Nye for not having carried on a sufficiently drastic investigation to determine whether or not money had been unlawfully or excessively expended in the State of North Carolina would not be excepted to by me; but that is not the point. He makes no point that Senator Nye was open to any criticism whatever because he did not investigate that matter thoroughly; he concedes that there was no ground for any investigation of that character; but he complains because Senator Nye did not investigate frauds totally unrelated to the question of the expenditure of money.

Mr. REED. I think, of course, that any of us should be subject to criticism, even wholly unfounded criticism, of our public acts; but the point that I caught as the Senator was reading it was the imputation of possible bribery; and it seems to me that that, in the absence of some evidence to sustain it, goes beyond the point of fair criticism.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the point I am making. This, it seems to me, is plainly a libelous charge, without, as the gentleman who uttered it says, the slightest foundation for it. He claims that he was laboring under an entire misapprehension; that he had no idea that the Nye committee was confined in its investigation to the matter of the expenditure of money. He was interrogated as to whether he did not know that the Reed committee, for instance, was appointed for the purpose of determining about the amount of money that had been expended; whether the Steiwer committee had not been appointed for that express purpose; but, although he was a Member of Congress, he disclaimed any knowledge of that fact but supposed that the committee was there for the purpose of inquiring into any frauds that might be committed in the prosesution of an election.

I should say in this connection that Mr. Jonas makes an explanation of this article. He tells us that the article was prepared by him, not at one time but a portion at one time and a portion at another time, and then the whole thing was thrown together; that having prepared it for publication in the North Carolina newspapers he caused it to be delivered to the correspondent of the Greensboro Daily News and other newspapers in North Carolina; and, having done so, he reflected upon the matter and reaching the conclusion that the observations to which I have called attention ought not to be made, he sought to get the copy back from the reporter.

Really what he said was that he prepared a revised copy, leaving out the two initial paragraphs that give offense, and that his stenographer made a mistake and gave out the original draft instead of the revised draft to the newspaper reporter; that it was on the eve of the close of Congress when he was very busily engaged, as is indeed quite likely, and that, learning of the thing, he sought to call the copy back from the reporter for the Greensboro News; and that he hunted all the afternoon and all the evening for him, but was unable to find him, and thus was unable to get the copy back. He was asked why he did not telegraph to the paper in that event to "kill" the article, and he said that that method had not occurred to him. Anyway, he was interrogated then as to what other newspapers printed the revised copy, and it was disclosed that no other paper printed either one or the other copy, the Greensboro News alone carrying the article.

I have no doubt in the world that the charge is libelous even though it is put in the subjunctive form. The statement, "If Senator Nye was not paid by the Democrats they owe him a debt of gratitude," it seems to me is quite as libelous as though he had directly charged that to be the case, and, as I say, and as he now states, without the slightest foundation for it and without any investigation upon his part, apparently, or even a recollection of the fact that Senator Nye was not called upon to investigate anything except the expenditure of money.

But there is antother offense. The article, as will be observed, bears date of January 13, 1931. It was stated on behalf of Mr. Jonas that the article was written in the heat of a political campaign and that many things are uttered at such times which are hastily spoken, but it will be observed that is not the case, for the article is in a newspaper which bears date of January 13, 1931, some two months after the election took place.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the article is signed by Mr. Jonas or whether it is a newspaper reporter's interview with him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. . No. It starts off as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 12.

[Daily News Bureau and Telegraph Office, 623 Albee Building (by leased wire)]

Washington, January 12.—Representative Charles A. Jonas, member of the Republican National Committee, to-day commented on the alleged election frauds that have been committed in the State during the current year in a manner that bordered on the sensational.

Then it says-

Said Mr. Jonas: "Representative of the Nye committee"-

And so on, and so on. And Mr. Jonas tells us that he actually prepared the article and does not question the authenticity of it at all. But on the 5th day of March the Raleigh News and Observer, another North Carolina newspaper, carried an article by its Washington correspondent, Mr. H. E. C. Bryant, whom, I have no doubt, many of the Senators know, a highly honorable gentleman whose acquaintance I have enjoyed for many years, even before I came to the Senate. That article reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 4.—The contest threatened by George M. Pritchard for the seat of Senator Balley was launched in the closing hours of the Senate to-day.

"This," Representative Charles A. Jonas said to-day, "is the first part of my answer to the attacks made on me by Senator Morrison and others."

Mr. Bryant continues:

There was a suspicion that the Pritchard action resulted from the failure of Mr. Jonas's nomination for district attorney. The Jonas declaration makes that clear.

Let me read that again:

"This," Representative Charles A. Jonas said to-day, "is the first part of my answer to the attacks made on me by Senator Morrison and others." There was a suspicion that the Pritchard action resulted from the failure of Mr. Jonas's nomination for district attorney. The Jonas declaration makes that clear.

Pritchard was the opponent of Senator Bailey in the election in November, 1930. There were rumors from time to time that he might or would institute a contest against the election of Senator Bailey, but up to the 4th day of March no contest had been filed. Meanwhile, as I have heretofore stated, Jonas had been nominated for the office of United States district attorney, and his nomination was then being opposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Morrison]. In that situation of affairs the Pritchard contest is filed, and Mr. Jonas, when asked what is meant by that, says:

That is the first part of my answer to the attacks made on me by Senator Morrison and others.

Mr. Jonas was interrogated about that and said that perhaps Mr. Bryant misunderstood him. Mr. Bryant says in an article printed later that there is no possibility of a mistake about it at all. Mr. Jonas then said that he would | not undertake to dispute whatever Mr. Bryant said about the matter, and that if Mr. Bryant said he made that statement he made it, but what he really meant was that the Pritchard contest was filed in order that he might have an opportunity in that contest to detail the alleged frauds which had occurred, as he contended, in the North Carolina election, and that in that way the institution of the Pritchard contest would be an answer to the attacks made upon him by Senator Morrison. That, however, did not seem to the committee to be a very reasonable construction of the language. The construction of the language put upon it by the correspondent, Mr. Bryant, seemed to the committee, at least to myself, very much more reasonable and likely than the one offered by Mr. Jonas.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to ask the Senator at this point whether there was any evidence before the committee that I had made any attack upon Mr. Jonas?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. None, except that it was in evidence that his confirmation as United States district attorney was being opposed by the Senator from North Caro-

Mr. MORRISON. But there was no evidence that I made any attack upon him at all. I simply filed a paper and said to the committee that it embodied my objections to him. I made no attack upon him at that time or any other.

I do not desire to say anything further, Mr. President. I think it no small offense upon the part of Mr. Jonas thus, without any justification whatever, to assail a Member of this body engaged in the discharge of the duties with which he is charged by the Senate of the United States. work, in my estimation, was an important piece of work, and, so far as I have been able to judge, was fairly discharged. Anyway, there was nothing in the North Carolina situation that seemed to warrant any such assault upon the chairman of the committee discharging the duties, as I say, with which he had been intrusted by the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will.

Mr. REED. I feel, as does the Senator from Montana. that that statement, although it was in the subjunctive, was clearly libelous and would support an action. I am wondering, however, whether the fact that a nominee has libeled a Member of the Senate in some manner that has nothing whatever to do with his appointment is a sound reason for his rejection.

Suppose, for example, that Mr. Jonas said that I, as Senator from Pennsylvania, had been bribed to vote as I did on the tariff bill. If it was worth while, I would sue him, prosecute him; but I am wondering whether that would be a reason for the Senate to reject his nomination. It might go to show that he was a man of no discretion and no common sense, and we might reject him for that reason: but the fact that he had libeled me might or might not be a sound reason for rejecting him. What is the view of the Senator about that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rather think the presumption would be that a man who had committed a libel against a Member of the Senate ought not to be elevated to public office by the assent of the Senate; but I go farther than that. This man is to be charged with important public duties. He is to be the United States prosecutor in that district. He is to prosecute diligently and with vigor every man whom he believes guilty of crime, and he is to be equally steadfast against subjecting to prosecution any citizen who in his judgment is not guilty of crime. He seems to me wholly given over to his unreasoning passions about some things, at least. Moreover, it will be observed that he tells us that his acquaintance with the law is so limited that he did not even know that the Nye committee was restricted in its functions to examination into the question of expenditure of money in the campaign.

His attention was called to the fact that the people of his State and of the South generally for many years have been strenuously objecting to any Federal investigation of their election proceedings or of their election laws; and in view of that situation, when all of our laws in relation to elections or control over elections anywhere in the country have been repealed except with respect to the expenditure of money in the conduct of elections, he was asked how he could imagine that the Nye committee was down there for the purpose of investigating frauds in the election in North Carolina arising out of what he contends are frailties in the election laws of the State of North Carolina; and he was obliged to say that that matter had not occurred to him at all.

It seems to me that all this goes to impeach his fitness for the office.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Montana takes his seat, may I ask him a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to say that Mr. Jonas attempted an explanation or made an explanation of the second article quoted, in which he used the expression describing the contest filed by Mr. Pritchard against the junior Senator from North Carolina; but I should like to ask the Senator if there was any denial that he used the language that was attributed to him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He practically admitted the language. He said, in the first place, that he thought Mr. Bryant had misinterpreted what he had said, but he eventually said that he would not dispute whatever Mr. Bryant said about it.

Mr. GEORGE. And offered an explanation which the Senator went into?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. But I want to get clear in my own mind whether he denied having made that statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; he did not.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, a very fair statement of the issue, I think, has been made by the Senator from Montana. However, I do not coincide with his conclusions.

It seems to me that the best way to get at the meat of this problem is to read the minority report and Mr. Jonas's testimony in reference to the Greensboro article and the Pritchard-Bailey contest.

Nomination of Charles A. Jonas

Mr. SCHALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the

We favor the confirmation of the nomination of Charles A.
Jonas to be United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina and submit to the Senate our reasons for our position, as follows:

1. There has been submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate abundant and reliable evidence from members of all political parties, including Judge E.-Y. Webb, district judge of the western district of North Carolina, to compel the conclusion that Mr. Jonas is a man of unexceptionable personal character, a lawyer Mr. Jonas is a man of unexceptionable personal character, a lawyer of ability, learning, and experience, and an upstanding citizen in his State, who has held various legislative and administrative positions, all of which he has filled with credit to himself and to the public. In fact, not a single criticism of the personal character, professional experience, or ability of this appointee was developed before the committee. On the contrary, Senator Walsh, chairman of the subcommittee which heard Mr. Jonas, stated to the full committee that he had received a great number of letters from judges, lawyers, and other citizens of North Carolina testifying to the excellent standing of Mr. Jonas as a lawyer and citizen. Senator Walsh says, page 17 of the printed hearing before the subcommittee: subcommittee:

"The Chairman. I feel like saying, Mr. Jonas, that I have had a large number of letters speaking of you, both as a man and as a lawyer, in terms of the very highest. And have had nothing to the

2. Mr. Jonas has served as United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina since March 4, 1931, under a recess appointment, and has theretofore held the office of assistant United States attorney in this district for a number of years, and in both positions he has demonstrated his ability, energy, and disposition to prosecute all cases on behalf of the Government without fear or favor. In proof of his fitness and capability for the place for which he has been nominated, we quote herein a telegram from Judge E. Y. Webb, United States district judge for the western district of North Carolina, addressed to a member of the committee; a quotation from the chief law officer of the Veterans' Bureau, advising as to his efficient conduct of cases on behalf of that bureau; and a letter from the Department of Justice, in which the full and complete satisfaction of that department with Mr. Jonas's conduct of his office is set forth. Senator Thomas D. Schall,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Answering your telegram asking my opinion of the character, ability, temperament, and general qualifications of Charles A. Jonas for United States attorney, beg to say that, in my opinion, his character and legal ability are good. He has served for a number of years as assistant district attorney and as United States attorney in the court over which I preside, and I regard him a conscientious, vigorous, and efficient public official. In the performance of his official duties I have seen nothing deserving censure or criticism. censure or criticism.

United States District Judge.

The following is an excerpt from a letter dated August 7, 1931, written by J. D. DeRamus, of Charlotte, N. C., insurance attorney of the Veterans' Bureau, to Maj. William Wolff Smith, special counsel on insurance claims:

"Mr. Jonas evinced a keen interest in the defense of all the cases and took an active and energetic part in the trials. He thoroughly familiarized himself with every case before it was called for trial; and notwithstanding the fact that these were the first war-risk-insurance cases to come on for trial since his appointment as United States attorney, he was well versed in the law and court decisions pertaining to war-risk insurance. He is a very brilliant lawyer, and this, coupled with his splendid reputation and wide experience, was in a large measure responsible for the Government prevailing in the 14 cases. We believe it to be a most unusual record for the Government to prevail in 14 insurance cases, without judgment being entered against it in a single case during one term of court. "Mr. Jonas evinced a keen interest in the defense of all the ca one term of court.

"This matter is called to your attention in order that you may know the excellent cooperation which the office of the United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina gives to the Veterans' Administration. It is a genuine pleasure for us to transact Government business with that office. If same meets with your approval, we suggest that you extend to Mr. Jonas and the Department of Justice our appreciation for the active and full cooperation given the Veterans' Administration in connection with the proper defense of war-risk-insurance actions."

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., March 3, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,

Hon. Thomas D. Schall, United States Senate, Washington, D. C. DEAR SENATOR: Charles A. Jonas was given a recess appointment as United States attorney for the western district of North Caro-lina on March 5, 1931. Since that time his service has been diligent, conscientious, and effective. The Department of Justice feels that his work has been very satisfactory. Yours very truly, CHARLES P. SISSON. Assistant Attorney General.

The personal character, experience, and professional fitness of Mr. Jonas being thus apparent, it remains to inquire whether he possesses any temperamental traits which disqualify him for

Senator J. W. BAILEY, of North Carolina, has filed with the Sen-Senator J. W. Bailey, of North Carolina, has filed with the Senate Judiciary Committee a complaint of seven specifications, from which he concludes that Mr. Jonas should not be confirmed. We are interested in but two of these specifications, namely, that he instigated the Pritchard-Bailey senatorial contest from North Carolina in bad faith for the purpose of forcing Senator Bailey's support for his confirmation; and that he has harshly criticized the Senate Committee on Investigation of Contributions and Expenses of Senatorial Candidates and attributed to it unworthy

Mr. Jonas has emphatically denied before the Senate Subjudi-clary Committee that he had in any wise aided or abetted in the instigation of the Pritchard-Bailey senatorial contest for the pur-pose alleged and states that, although he understood that such contest was under consideration, he had never at any time thought of it or contemplated its use for the purpose alleged by Senator Balley, and, in the absence of definite specifications on this point, we do not dwell further upon this aspect of the case. The alleged severe and unjustified criticism of the Committee

The alleged severe and unjustified criticism of the Committee on Investigation of Contributions and Expenses of Senatorial Candidates and the imputation to it of dishonorable motives is, however, a matter for the consideration of the Senate.

While Mr. Jonas admits that he did in fact make certain severe strictures upon what he understood to be the acts and omissions of Senator Nye's committee while in his State, a fact that he now deeply regrets, he denies that he had any intention whatever of reflecting upon the honor and integrity of the committee or any member of it, or of questioning their honest intentions, and he has made personal apology to Senator Nyz and the committee. He states that his criticims had their inspiration in the fact that he, as national committeeman of his party for the State, had, at the time of his utterances, a great mass of evidence of the commission of extensive frauds in the election of 1930, which he mission of extensive frauds in the election of 1930, which he thought the committee's inquiries would reveal, and in the further fact that leading Democratic politicians and Democratic newspapers of the State had hailed the result of the committee's inquiries as a party triumph. That he was, at the time he made such strictures, of the belief that a thorough inquiry into these charges by Senator Nye's committee would awaken public attention to the situation and bring about a change in election methods through State legislation; that although he knew that the Federal Government had but little control over elections in the States, he, nevertheless, believed that the committee was in a better position than any other agency to reveal, as an incident of its inquiries, the actual facts in relation to the conduct of elections in his State.

It appears from his testimony before the Subcommittee on the

It appears from his testimony before the Subcommittee on the Judiciary that he expected more from the committee's inquiries than its limited authority would warrant, and this misunderstanding appears to have added to his provocation; that upon his realization of the fact that the committee's duties were limhis realization of the fact that the committees duties were limited to an inquiry into primary-election expenditures in the election of 1930, he became conscious that it had performed its functions faithfully within the limits of its authority and that he could not have rightly expected more from it.

We have no thought of discussing, or making any criticisms of, North Carolina election methods and have no knowledge as to the could be the properties.

North Carolina election methods and have no knowledge as to the actual facts in the premises, and merely recount these representations by Mr. Jonas in order that his state of mind at the time of the alleged utterances may be duly appreciated. We are fully aware that the purpose of the committee in his State, and its only authority, was to ascertain whether there had been undue and improper expenditures of money in the senatorial primary of 1930, and we have no doubt that that duty was performed to the best of the committee's ability and understanding.

The necessities of the committee's inquiries within recent years have been of so great and important nature that its investigations have necessarily had to be more extensive and searching than any have necessarily had to be more extensive and searching than any like inquiries heretofore made, and it is not too much to say that many intelligent newspapers and citizens, from lack of understanding of all the facts and circumstances of these important cases, have made severe criticisms of the acts of the committee, and it can not be said that such criticisms have, in all instances, arisen from improper motives or a disposition to impede the work of the committee. It is not our aim to justify these criticisms, but to give, as well as we can, the proper coloring of the situation in which they were uttered.

As for his criticisms of the committee, we do not deem them As for his criticisms of the committee, we do not deem them destructive of the character, integrity, or usefulness of the committee, and have no thought that its standing will be impaired by them. We feel deeply the duty of protecting the Senate, and particularly the Members from Mr. Jonas's State, from any embarrassment or improvident approval of an unworthy nominee for a high public position. The dignity and rights of the Senate, and due deference to the Members from the different States, must at all times be maintained. We have taken all these factors into consideration in considering the Jonas case. That his criticisms consideration in considering the Jonas case. That his criticisms of the committee were unduly severe, as well as ill founded, is clearly apparent. But we are of the opinion that the chief consticlearly apparent. But we are of the opinion that the chief consti-tutional aim in requiring senatorial approval of presidential ap-pointments is the certainty of the personal character of the nomi-nee and his ability and fitness to discharge the duties of the place whereunto he has been named, and not any mere incidental foible or weakness of temperament or expression, things of which all men are more or less heir. Our Government is founded upon the hon-est criticisms of intelligent public opinion. That the right of crit-icism will often lead to excesses, all men know. In these days all public men and public measures are under the searchlight of inquiry and criticism. But while unguarded and unwarranted criticisms of men and measures are to be deplored, it is too much criticisms of men and measures are to be deplored, it is too much criticisms of men and measures are to be deplored, it is too much to expect that men shall be free from them.

We think it clear from the record that Mr. Jonas is a man of uprightness of character and integrity; that he is a learned, experienced, and ethical lawyer; that he has demonstrated his ability to discharge faithfully and efficiently the duties of his trust; that he has filled a number of public places in his State, and always with credit to himself and the public; that, while his criticisms of the Committee on Contributions and Expenses of Senatorial Candidates are to be deplored, they do not affect either the good name of the committee or of the Senate as a whole; and, furthermore, the nominee's good character and professional fitness being demonstrated, and there being no suggestion of any criticism by him of the Senators from his State, or either of them, we do not find any grounds for holding him obnoxious to them, and we, therefore, recommend his confirmation.

Respectfully submitted.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. President, the Members voting for the minority report were Senators Borah, Hastings, Robinson, Hebert, Austin, Waterman, and Schall.

Several charges were made against Mr. Jonas by Senator BAILEY, but they were held immaterial by the entire Judiciary Committee except those that were concerned with newspaper statements relative to the Nye committee investigation of election expenditures and the Pritchard-Bailey

The objections to Mr. Jonas because of what he said about the Nye committee are based on a newspaper article that appeared in the Greensboro Daily News at Greensboro, N. C., on Tuesday morning, January 13, 1931.

Mr. President, it might be well to state here in order that the Senators may understand the psychology of the situation and the smarting condition of Mr. Jonas's mind, that Mr. Jonas was elected to the House of Representatives in 1928 and was defeated in 1930 and that he felt his defeat was contributed to by misinformation published in the newspapers concerning the Nye committee. The article referred to follows:

Representatives of the Nye committee continue to assemble evidence of alleged frauds in the 1930 primary and general election in North Carolina. What the committee will finally do about the In North Carolina. What the committee will finally do about the North Carolina situation no one seems to know. I have never met or spoken to Senator Nyz or any other member of the committee in my life. I have never believed Senator Nyz intends to seriously investigate the North Carolina case if he can help it. If the Democrats did not pay him to come to the State and, without any Democrats did not pay him to come to the State and, without any serious effort to secure evidence, give out a statement that the situation in the State is "refreshing," then they at least owe him a debt of gratitude. Never was there a plainer case of an attempt to whitewash. As an investigation, his conduct in the State was painful, pitiful, and puerile. He is a fiend for publicity, as are all the sleepy-eyed, dreamy "sons of wild jackasses" in the Senate. He could cuff old Vare and other regular Republicans around with impunity, and the press and politicians, including those in North Carolina, would rollick with glee and bid him "lay on, McDuff," but when he came to North Carolina and innocently asked those charged with fraud whether they had been naughty, he got only a frost and newspaper reminder that he had no business "meddling with our affairs," but also a fatherly lecture from the witness stand to the effect that North Carolina has 100 counties, and after all $100,000 is not an enormous sum as election the witness stand to the effect that North Carolina has 100 counties, and after all $100,000 is not an enormous sum as election matters go. And Nyz apologetically exclaimed through the press, "how refreshing!" And moved on to where the right kind of publicity awaited. True, he found in one day evidence of a number of substantial expenditures in behalf of the successful senatorial candidate not accounted for in his sworn report, but the atmosphere was too drab for him to linger when Nebraska offered so much more excitement of the kind he was seeking.

The Charlotte News rightly said a few days ago there should be a complete investigation. But when, how, and where? There is little use to depend upon the Nye committee. Besides, our Demoratic friends do not desire that committee to nose around too much in the State. Criminal actions in the courts are out of the question, if for no other reason than the multiplicity of actions and enormous expense and time required if private citizens should undertake this method. Further, the case of double voting by Doctor Avery and wife at Maiden and the registrar case at Shelby completely show the futility of pursuing this course. The solicitors of the State could wake the dead if they were minded to perform great public service, forget politics, and sift these charges to the bottom in an impartial and nonpartisan way. But will they? One paper suggested I should assume the burden of proving them. But no individual or group of individuals can successfully lay the facts before the people. The Charlotte News rightly said a few days ago there should be lay the facts before the people.

Mr. President, Mr. Jonas stated to the committee:

While I accept responsibility for that article, I deem it not improper to state the circumstances surrounding its preparation and proper to state the circumstances surrounding its preparation and publication. As published, it does not in several particulars represent my sentiments or purpose.

The material for the article had been assembled over a considerable period and in piecemeal. When the first draft was assembled, it included the first two paragraphs as published, containing the references to Senator Nyr and others which are objected to. I corrected this draft personally by deleting all references that could be personally objected to by anyone. I was not interested in personalities. My complaint was against a system and not against persons.

A copy of the final draft was handed to me as I passed my office A copy of the final draft was handed to me as I passed my office going from the Judiciary Committee room to the floor of the House. At the first opportunity I began reading my copy and was amazed to find the first two paragraphs were included as in the original. It was apparent to me that the final draft was made from the original instead of from the proofed draft.

I immediately called my secretary, Miss Lucy Rarey, to see that copies were not given the press until I could make proper corrections. I was informed copies had already been given out. Miss Rarey and I spent the evening and into the night endeavoring to recall the article. We succeeded event as to the copy given the recall the article. We succeeded except as to the copy given the Greensboro Daily News, in which case we did not get in touch with the correspondent until too late. Upon receipt of copy of charges, I wrote Miss Rarey to state her recollection of the incident to be filed with the committee. I attach hereto her reply, marked "Exhibit F."

I deny that I ever intended to "insult the members" of the Nye committee or "gravely reflect upon this committee" or im-pute to it or its members corrupt motives; and I deny that I ever intended to criticize or mention the committee or any of its members other than Senator Nyz.

The provocation for the criticism I intended to make is as follows

(a) Members of the Nye committee arranged to come to the State October 13, 1930 (three weeks before the general election), to investigate charges of primary frauds. The Asheville Citizen of that date said: "Nye group's right to hold probe challenged—supporters of Bailey gather to plan fight. Mr. Bailey, when seen at the manor last night declared the (Nye) committee is coming to North Carolina on the eve of election for purely political purposes"—characterizing the Nye investigation of the North Carolina primary as unprecedented. Editorially the same paper said: "Mr. Bryant [meaning Mr. H. E. C. Bryant, Washington correspondent] says that at Washington it is believed by persons conversant with the facts that the program for North Carolina is not a frank, sincere effort to get facts but a plan to appease outside Republicans the facts that the program for North Carolina is not a frank, sincere effort to get facts but a plan to appease outside Republicans who think the committee has devoted too much time to Republican States." I have filed with the committee the Asheville Citizen of October 13, 1930, as Exhibit G.

(b) October 14, 1930, the Asheville Citizen headlined "Bailey men delighted at outcome of Capital City inquiry," saying, in the body of the report, "Senator Gerald P. Nye, insurgent Republican, characterized the hearing as 'most refreshing in comparison with some of the things discovered in other States.'." In the same article Judge James S. Manning, Bailey campaign manager, was quoted as follows: "I am certainly pleased over the result of the investigation but in no sense surprised. The probe will serve to quoted as follows: "I am certainly pleased over the result of the investigation but in no sense surprised. The probe will serve to bring the whispering campaign to a close. The result of the affair will have the reaction of establishing confidence in the party organization and will greatly add to Mr. Baller's prestige and aid in his election." I am filing with the committee copy of the Asheville Citizen of October 14, 1930, marked "Exhibit H."

(c) October 15, 1930, the Asheville Citizen headlined "Inquiry in this State pleases Nye committee—Absolutely nothing is found to verify any charges made—Terms conditions here refreshing-Primary probers praise clean politics in North Carolina." The followed: "Senator Nye stated he was frankly surprised at th facts brought out at the hearing here yesterday and at Raleigh Monday, and added that the refreshing nature of the campaign in this State in comparison with some of these investigated in other States was very noticeable." This issue of the Citizen is filed with the committee, marked "Exhibit I."

(d) In the Greensboro News of October 14, 1930, in a report of the investigation in the State, Senator Nyz is quoted as saying, among other things, "What we have encountered here is most reamong other things, "What we have encountered here is most refreshing, and the committee congratulates you on your attitude. It has seemed nobody has tried to conceal anything; and if you have deceived us, you have been very clever in doing it. You have, it seems to us, been very jealous of your elections here." The press stated 200 witnesses had been subpanaed by the committee for the hearing, and that 14 of them were examined. A copy of that issue of that paper is filed with the committee, marked "Exhibit J."

hearing, and that 14 of them were examined. A copy of that issue of that paper is filed with the committee, marked "Exhibit J."

(e) Greensboro News of October 15, 1930, headlined "Nye probe viewed as big aid to campaign—Democrats regard outcome as year's best contribution to their cause." Under the above headline there appears the following:

"As to political corruption flowing out of lax election laws, the findings in Raleigh were even more in favor of the Balley men than anybody had a right to expect.

"It was thought that the committee would at least rate the North Carolina laws as archaic, and thus a reproach to a free electorate. Instead the committee praised them. Mr. Nye thought the citizens of the State had been rather jealous of a good political name. There was a good deal to be said against certain looseness in the absentee ballot set, but the committee thought well of the election laws, an estimate not shared by thousands of good Democrats who had occasion to observe elections in recent years. Thus, the Nye-Patterson-Wagner visit has made the Democrats feel Democrats who had occasion to observe elections in recent years. Thus, the Nye-Patterson-Wagner visit has made the Democrats feel good. It turned up nothing that will be difficult to explain in a campaign; indeed, the answer of the Democrats to the conventional charges of the Republicans must be the report of the committee. To be sure, it isn't yet framed, nor has the Senate been asked to receive Mr. Balley. But Mr. Nye's visit has nullified much campaign material which has been in circulation all the fall."

A copy of that issue of the Greensboro News is filed with the committee, marked "Exhibit K."

Based upon the above newspaper reports, there appeared many committee, marked "Exhibit K."

Based upon the above newspaper reports, there appeared many editorials in Democratic papers to the effect that the Nye Committee had made an investigation and approved election conditions and the methods here. I had not been interested in the Nye Committee investigation. Senator Nyz was reported as interested chiefly in charges of large outside sums of money alleged to have been used in the primary, and I did not believe proof would be found of the use of such funds.

I did not "prejudge" the work of the Nye committee. I was objecting to its prejudgment by the newspapers when only a mere beginning had been made in taking testimony, placing the stamp of approval on election conditions in the State, allegedly out of the mouth of the chairman of a committee of the Senate fixed with the duty of investigating these conditions, on the very fixed with the duty of investigating these conditions, on the very eve of the general election, greatly prejudicing not only my own election but that of every candidate on my ticket. Every election manipulator who read the reports and editorials felt that his practices had been approved. I felt a great injustice had been done me and my party associates.

In view of these reports, as to statements by Senator Nyz which I had no reason to believe incorrect and under these conditions, I meant to say in my article that, whether intentionally or not, he had rendered our opponents service which was worth more than all the money they could spend and they were under a debt of gratitude therefor; and that the Senator was a flend for publicity. That this part of the article contained language that should not have been used, I agree. That I ever intended that objectionable references or implications should appear, I deny.

Later Senator Nys stated publicly his references while in North Carolina to the investigation and conditions in the State had been misunderstood, and that he had meant only to compliment witnesses appearing before the committee and testifying fully without challenging the jurisdiction of the committee as in some other States. Thereupon I expressed to him sincere regret for any unintentional wrong I had done him. I have no reason to

- other States. Thereupon I expressed to him sincere regret for any unintentional wrong I had done him. I have no reason to believe my apology was not accepted.

  I have not called "14" or any other number of Senators fiends for publicity. The "vane" men spoke of originally as "colts of the wild ass" are not confined to section, creed, or class.

  Nothing I have ever said was intended to "intimate that it [the Nye committee] might have been corrupt," nor do I concede that anything I said is susceptible of any such construction. I deny that anything I said was malicious. I again assert no objectionable references were intended by me to appear in that article. Such criticisms as I intended were made in good faith, in the belief that the newspaper reports of alleged statements and activities of Senator Nye while he was in our State were correct.

  I deny that I have intentionally made false, wanton, or unfounded statements about election conditions in the State. I have called attention to frauds and irregularities alleged to have been practiced in our last election. I believe reliable information and complaints in my possession warrant the statements complained of. For many years I have pointed out evils existing in our election system and have agitated for fair and free elections, not for the purpose of dishonoring the State or insulting its citizens, but in the hope of securing for our people needed election reforms. Some of the leading Democratic newspapers and eminent Democrats, including Senator Baller himself, have labored diligently to point out existing evils and advocated their eradication. As evidence of this fact I attach hereto and mark as Exhibits A, B, C, D, and E.

  Mr. President, I here quote only extracts of these exhibits,
- Mr. President, I here quote only extracts of these exhibits, and ask that they be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.
- (A) Report of speech by J. W. Balley in News and Observer of August 12, 1926:

This [meaning North Carolina] is supposed to be a progressive State, but it is the most backward of all, excepting possibly South Carolina, in the means of assuring a fair and accurate count of ballots. I say that our election and primary laws are not framed for the assurance of a fair election but for the purpose of enabling fraud to be perpetrated and of concealing the perpetrators.

fraud to be perpetrated and of concealing the perpetrators. * * Take an instance back yonder in 1912, over in the second division of the first ward; it was at White's store. At that precinct they voted a setter dog. The dog with the ballot in his mouth, went up to the box and the ballot was placed in the box and counted. The man who did that made no bones about it; he regarded it as a great joke. There is no way to count the votes after they are cast and there is no power to go behind the registrar and poll holders to attack the dog's vote unless somebody shows an inaccuracy in making returns. There is no way to attack the returns in a primary.

(B) Extract from January 7, 1931, issue of Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C., containing part of sermon by Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D., pastor of First Presbyterian Church, Asheville, N. C., dealing with election frauds in the State:

For instance, we have an absentee law, whereby under certain restrictions people who are absent or physically unable to go to the polls are enabled to vote. This thing is abused and perverted in a shameful way. There have been people, I doubt not, who voted the absentee ballot who were absent from this planet and it could not be known where they were. And no medium was present to communicate with them as to how they wanted their votes cast. These absentees did not vote; they were voted through corruption of the ballot by the ring.

- (C) Report of hearing before house committee on elections on bill to repeal absentee ballot law, appearing in News and Observer, January 30, 1931:
- Mrs. M. H. Harris, prominent Asheville business woman and property owner and member of the Asheville League of Women Voters' organization, minced no words in telling of abuses, stating that Asheville had many sanatoriums and that their patients had been voted regularly without their knowledge, and persons dead five years were continuing to vote.

(D) Copy of editorial in Greensboro Daily News, July 12, 1928, on grand-jury investigation of primary frauds in Robeson County:

That 10 more votes were cast in South Lumberton precinct than voters registered; that the same people in a number of instances voted in both North and South Lumberton precincts; that a citizen halted carloads of people in Britts No. 1 placing a marked ballot and a dollar bill in the lap of each voter.

(E) Report of hearing before election laws committee of house of representatives appearing in Greensboro Daily News, February 14, 1929:

He (Westall) told how Miss Bonnie Franks, a school teacher, was voted as an absentee with Grady Turner as witness. She voted ballot 231 and did not authorize anybody to get her absentee ballot. Grady Turner is a fictitious name. R. L. Melton, former resident of Asheville, now living in Detroit, Mich., was voted twice in the precinct which was making Miss Franks so energetic. Melton was on the poll books as No. 393 and 580. Both witnesses, C. F. Flemming and Robert Bridges, are unknown.

Mr. President, I again quote Mr. Jonas:

I deny that I have ever in thought or word meant to question the integrity of character, charge with corruption or corrupt mo-tives, or insult any Senator of the United States. I may have sharply disagreed with Senators and criticized their course of action, as I criticized Senator Nyz because of published statements action, as I criticized Senator Nye because of published statements and activities attributed to him in connection with the investigation of the 1930 primary in North Carolina, which criticisms are the basis of the principal charge against me. But I assert that it was never in my mind or heart to insult or attribute evil or corrupt motives to Senator Nye or any other Senator. For any statement of mine considered by Senator Nye or any other Senator as personally insulting, or which is susceptible of interpretation that would impute evil or corrupt motive, I express sincere regret and apology, not for the purpose of influencing the result of this investigation but as a duty one gentleman owes to another.

Quoting Mr. Jonas further:

Now, may I say this also? I do not want to unnecessarily take up time here. There is no reason in the world—my whole habit of life would contradict the idea that I ever intended to characterize the so-called progressives in the Senate in an uncomplimentary way. My father was a Populist and he was called one of the dreamy-eyed wild men of his day. I was brought up in the Populist Party. I left the Populist Party after it died. In 1912 I left the Republican Party and gave out a statement there and became one of the loudest-mouthed Bull Mooses in the State of North Carolina, and was read out of the Republican Party by it. In 1916 I went to the Chicago convention and voted for Theodore Roosevelt up to the very last breath.

In 1920 Senator Hiram Johnson came through my town, and I was one of his supporters in 1920, and I sent my 16-year-old son to Chicago as a rooter for Hiram Johnson.

I tell you that to say that I meant—and may I go farther in

I tell you that to say that I meant—and may I go farther in saying that I regard Senator Borah as one of the ablest men in the United States? He came into my district in 1928 and did more than any other man in America to elect me to Congress. To say that I would refer to Senator Borah in those it was far from any intention of mine.

Mr. President, the only other objection considered by the entire Senate Judiciary Committee as material was the newspaper statement of Mr. Jonas's reference to the Pritchard-Bailey contest.

The junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley] claims that Mr. Jonas shows his unworthiness of confirmation by reason of making a certain statement in answer to a question by a certain Washington correspondent, Mr. H. E. C. Bryant, about the said Pritchard-Bailey contest, asking Mr. Jonas for a statement wherein Mr. Jonas answered that he would make a statement later, but at which time the said correspondent quoted Mr. Jonas as follows:

This is the first part of an answer to the attacks made on me.

About this statement Mr. Jonas has the following to say: The Pritchard contest was not instigated by me or by anyone else as a result of holding up my confirmation. The contest had been considered seriously long before my appointment as United States attorney was made. Senator Balley filed with the committee the Greensboro News of January 20, 1931; that was almost a month before I was appointed. That paper front-page head-lined: "Now appears likely Pritchard will start contest—many higher-ups in G. O. P. reported to favor this action."

The inference that the contest was a threat against Senator

Baller to force him to agree to the confirmation of my appointment is not well founded. At that time I had absolutely no intimation that the Senator would oppose my confirmation. The Pritchard contest and the confirmation of my appointment, so far as I am concerned or have any knowledge, have no relation-the House March 3, 1931. Everybody was in a hurry. Cone was about to adjourn. It was my last day as a Member. asked me for a statement about the Pritchard contest. I him I had no statement to make and did not desire to be quoted, but I would give him a statement in a few days, which statement appeared in his paper on March 8. The relationship between the contest and my case was mentioned, and language in substance similar to that carried in his dispatch in the News and Observer. similar to that carried in his dispatch in the News and Observer of March 5 filed with the committee by Senator Balley (but was not the language used in the written objections) was used. If I used that language, I meant only that since opposition to the confirmation, as I understood, was based on my statements about election conditions in North Carolina, an investigation would determine whether they were justified or I had "slandered the State." To interpret that incident or anything I said as an attempt on my part to threaten or cajole Senator Balley or any other person to support my confirmation (which I did not then know he opposed) is to give is a meaning wholly at variance with any thought I ever entertained.

My record of five years prosecuting the docket in the United

My record of five years prosecuting the docket in the United States district court of my district should be some evidence as to my fitness to serve as United States attorney. The judge of the district is a Democrat and a former chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. His unqualified in-Committee of the House of Representatives. His unqualified indorsement of me was filed with the Department of Justice when I was appointed. If he will state I am temperamentally or otherwise unfitted to discharge creditably the duties of this office, I shall resign forthwith. I have tried to discharge the duties of the office in a sane and impartial manner. If confirmed, I shall continue to do so, without regard to creed, class, color, or influence. I appeal from the accusation to the record.

I deny that I have ever meant to say or intimate that Senator Balley, Senator Morrison, any Member of the House, or any responsible leader in the State Democratic organization participated in, approved, or encouraged corruption, fraud, or unlawful or evil practices in regard to our elections. I assert again my criticisms have been entirely impersonal and made in good faith.

Mr. President, I have some newspaper clippings and editorials I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The clippings and editorials appear later.)

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the safety of our Republic lies not in our growth alone, not in our armies and navies, not even in the perfection of our laws, for laws may be disregarded, and a disregarded law is poison. It eats away the very foundation upon which rest our liberties. The safety of our Nation is the devotion of our people to its free institutions, free speech, and our public schools.

Mr. Jonas, as a graduate of our public schools, has only exercised his right of free speech in an attempt to purify the method of elections in his State. He is a self-made man and he has done a good job.

He worked his way through the common schools and the high schools. Thinking that a high-school education was not sufficient when opportunity was afforded for a better one, he entered the University of North Carolina. He worked his way through the university by waiting tables, chopping wood, pounding carpets, doing anything he could do to earn an honest dime. He graduated from the university in 1902 with a bachelor of philosophy degree. He continued in the university, studying law and later was admitted to the bar and is now acknowledged one of the greater lawyers of the great State of North Carolina.

The record is overflowing with more than a hundred letters from prominent and vital people of his State as to his ability as a lawyer, his honesty and uprightness as a man, and his general interest in mankind. Everywhere he is recognized as a hard-hitting, red-blooded, two-fisted fighter. When he believes he is right he stands upon that decision though the heavens may fall. Because of his sterling, positive character, no one, not even his political enemies, have presumed to utter one word against him as a man, a neighbor, and a citizen, nor has there been any other thought expressed than that he is one of the best lawyers in the State. His integrity has been without question. He stands preeminently from that hearing as one of North Carolina's great and trusted citizens. Judges and lawyers from all over the State have indorsed him.

Educated in the school of toil and hard knocks, as well as the school of science, arts, and literature, he is deemed specially qualified to fill any office in the gift of his State or

Mr. H. C. Bryant called me on the telephone while I was in his country. He is one of the common people, knowing their ne House March 3, 1931. Everybody was in a hurry. Congress trials and tribulations because he came that way himself trials and tribulations because he came that way himself.

> Mr. President, I think a good judge or a good prosecuting attorney or for that matter any public official is not fully qualified to take that position and do justice to it without having had the experience of earning his own way, of helping himself and doing the things that the ordinary person must do. Those public men who come to high position who have not had this experience of the common man, knowing his trials and tribulations, are not equipped to understand humanity and are, too often, because of that lack of understanding, impelled to make decisions that lack justice and understanding.

> That the people he lives among have every confidence in him is shown in that he was elected to the State house of representatives and twice elected as State senator. In 1916 he was elected to the board of trustees of the University of North Carolina by a Democratic legislature and still serves on that board. He has served for five years as assistant United States attorney, showing unusual experience for this particular office to which he has been nominated by the President.

> In 1928 he was elected by his congressional district to the House of Representatives here in Washington and made an excellent and able Representative. In 1930 he was defeated for reelection to Congress and felt that that defeat was in a large measure due to misinformation printed in the newspapers concerning the investigation of the Nye committee. Smarting under that defeat, as he himself puts it, he indiscreetly made a statement that was printed in the Greensboro News and from which arises all this hullaballoo concerning his confirmation.

> The Nye committee came to North Carolina along the middle of October, just a little time before election. Senator Balley himself said concerning the Nye committee:

> Is coming to North Carolina on the eve of election for purely political purposes.

And stating further, Senator Balley said:

The Nye investigation of the North Carolina primary was unprecedented.

Senator Walsh just now criticized Mr. Jonas for not knowing that the Nye committee only had power to investigate expenditures. I think it is fair to assume that if Senator Balley did not realize at this time that the Nye committee had only the power to investigate expenditures that it does not entirely condemn Mr. Jonas for not knowing it. The newspapers, in my opinion, are entirely to blame, because of misinformation printed concerning what the Nye committee was going to do and what they did do for Mr. Jonas's attack upon Senator Nye. Anyway, the information printed in the newspapers is the information that is in the minds of the people and must be met. Had Mr. Jonas realized that the Nye committee was only investigating expenditures and that it did not pretend to go to the conduct and manner and method of handling those elections, I do not believe that the statement complained of would have been made.

Senators, you have heard Mr. Jonas's testimony concerning what he did to try to head off this statement. You have heard also of his fight in trying to bring about fair and honest elections in the State. By his statement he was only attempting to bring to the attention of the people the disregard for the election laws of his State. There is nothing unusual in this attempt that he should be denied confirmation. Senator Balley used even more trenchant words in his condemnation of the disregard for those same election laws, yet he is objecting to Mr. Jonas for making the same kind of a fight for the same end.

Hear Senator Balley as he says:

We need the Australian ballot system but even that is not proof against corruption. Pennsylvania has the Australian ballot but you saw not long ago what happened up there; Illinois has it, and you read about corruption in the recent primary in that State.

They spend millions in Pennsylvania and Illinois for an office that pays $10,000 and lasts but six years. They don't spend that much in North Carolina because they don't have to, but they do spend $250,000 in North Carolina, and if it becomes necessary to spend a million they will spend it.

Mr. Jonas was laboring under the idea that the Nye committee had the right to look into frauds of election, such as Mr. Bailey called attention to in a speech. Mr. Bailey said that North Carolina was the most backward State in the Union except South Carolina, and he said that they voted dogs and counted the ballots, and that votes were counted that had been put into the ballot box written upon cigarette papers.

I notice in the record letters and newspaper clippings galore where Democrats are making the same corrupt charges as to the North Carolina elections. Where a minister, claiming to be a Democrat, says they voted whole sanatoriums without any of the inmates' knowledge, and that people dead for years had been voted without even the aid of a medium. There is no question that the charges fly thick and fast in North Carolina concerning corrupt elections and we should judge of what Mr. Jonas has had to say concerning them with these charges in mind.

Mr. Jonas expected an investigation of such charges but instead the Nye committee investigated expenditures as it had only the authority to do and found that $100,000 had been spent in a State of a hundred counties, which seemed to Mr. Nye "refreshing." I understand that the Nye committee subpensed a couple hundred witnesses; that 14 were examined, but they were only examined as to expenditures.

Mr. Jonas was thinking of the actual conditions and methods used in these elections and burst forth in condemnation of Senator Nye, which he now understands was unjust to Senator Nye, and he has, like a man, said so. Senator Nye is not complaining of anything said concerning him. He has accepted Mr. Jonas's apology and, I am given to understand, appreciates Mr. Jonas's misconception as to the whole affair. Mr. Jonas was only attempting to point out to the people of his State the miscarriage of justice and the unfairness of such elections.

If Senator NyE were complaining and objecting to Mr. Jonas's confirmation I would believe that there was sufficient base, but I can not understand, unless Senator Nye has assigned to Senator Balley his right of action, how Senator Bailey can be here heard to complain of the things Mr. Jonas said connected with the Nye committee, which he himself only a short time before reiterated, though he did not connect them with the Nye committee, but did make disparaging statements concerning the Nye committee before it arrived in the State and previous to its actions and before he found that the report of the committee was it found things "refreshing" in North Carolina. In view of the conditions that Mr. Jonas knew existed, and not realizing that the Nye committee was speaking of expenditures only, can you see how Mr. Jonas might say that the Nye committee had been of great help to the Democrats, even more than money could pay for?

Mr. Jonas was fighting for principle and did not mean to attack anyone personally. That is the only fair way of looking at these published statements.

I realize, and agree with Senator Walsh, that one of these statements is undoubtedly libelous, but the right of action for that libel lies not with Senator Balley but with Senator Nye, and Senator Nye is making no complaint and, I understand, will vote for Mr. Jonas.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SCHALL. I yield.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will yield at that point I should like to say that I have no objection to any of the remarks he is offering except that I have not at any time stated that I had intended to vote for Mr. Jonas. I have persistently said that I would not under any circumstances make the present controversy a political one or a personal one.

Mr. SCHALL. Yes; that is the exact statement the Senator made to me some time ago, but I had heard indirectly he was going to vote for Mr. Jonas.

The other point held as material by the committee was Mr. Jonas's reference to the Pritchard-Bailey contest where it is claimed Mr. Jonas, when informed by a newspaper reporter of the filing of such a contest, said, "This is my first step in vindicating myself." Mr. Jonas claims that this was a statement made in confidence to the reporter and that he told the reporter that he did not want to be quoted. The reporter does not remember that Mr. Jonas so confined him.

Mr. Jonas was first nominated by the President for this office on the 9th of February, 1931. On account of there being so short a time to the following 4th of March, no action was taken upon the nomination. The President then gave Mr. Jonas an interim appointment which he is now serving. At the opening of this Congress, the President again sent his name in for this office. Senator Bailey had not yet become Senator and certainly Mr. Jonas could not have known that Senator Bailey would oppose him in the present session and therefore would not have participated in any contest.

Mr. Jonas explains that the expression was made only that he thought that the hearing of such a contest would show up the system that he had been fighting against, and again I reiterate that Mr. Jonas had only the principle in the matter at heart for which he was fighting, that it was nothing personal, either concerning Senator Nye or Senator Balley.

Mr. Jonas is the outstanding Republican of North Carolina; he is a member of the Republican National Committee, which office, if this nomination is confirmed, he informs me by letter, he intends to resign, and has sent in his resignation to the effect that if he is confirmed he is to be relieved of the office. If a Republican is to be appointed to this office, certainly no Republican in North Carolina is more entitled to that position than Mr. Jonas. If Mr. Jonas's confirmation is not had at the hands of the Senate to-day, it will work an injustice not only upon Mr. Jonas but upon every fearless, red-blooded, hard-fighting Republican in the State and on every man, be he Republican or Democrat, who earnestly and conscientiously attempts to bring such reforms in our election laws as will uphold and support the foundation upon which our Republic is built.

Shall we say that because a man dares to stand up and fight for what he believes to be right that he shall be punished? Shall we say that the most prominent Republican and lawyer in the State can not be confirmed to an office for which he is eminently qualified? That everyone, including the entire Judiciary Committee, agrees that he is eminently qualified to fill, can not be confirmed because of some discrepancy in newspaper gossip? I think the President has chosen the best Republican he could find in the State for that office, and he should be, and I hope he will be confirmed.

Mr. President, I have many letters bearing on this subject. I do not think I need to burden the Record with all of them, but there are some documents, editorials, and letters which I should like to have printed in the Record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

[The News and Observer, Raleigh, N. C., Thursday, August 12, 1926]
SAYS STATE ON LEVEL WITH PENNSYLVANIA AND ILLINOIS—J. W. BAILEY TELLS RALEIGH LIONS ELECTIONS JUST AS BAD IN NORTH CAROLINA—
SIMPLY DO NOT HAVE TO SPEND AS MUCH MONEY—DECLARES AUSTRALIAN BALLOT AND VOTING MACHINES NECESSARY IN NORTH CARO-

Declaring that elections in North Carolina are just as corrupt as in Pennsylvania and Illinois, where recent scandals have shocked the entire country, Josiah W. Balley, prominent Raleigh lawyer and former candidate for governor, yesterday told the Raleigh Lions Club that this State not only has corrupt elections but holds its elections and primaries under the most backward laws in the entire country, except possibly South Carolina.

"We need the Australian ballot system—but even that is not proof against corruption," declared Mr. Bailey. "Pennsylvania has the Australian ballot, but you saw not long ago what happened up there; Illinois has it, and you read about the corruption in the recent primary in that State. Mr. Pinchot said he spent a quarter of a million in Pennsylvania, Mr. Pepper says he spent $800,000, and Mr. Vare says he spent a million. In Illinois we know they spent from one to three millions. But this thing is denounced in our law. It is against the law to contribute to candidates without making a report of them; it is against the law to stuff ballot boxes; there are 20 criminal acts providing fines and even penitentiary sentences in our election laws. But the trouble is we don't pay any attention to them, just as they do in Pennsylvania, and we have just as much corruption here in North Carolina as they have. The trouble is with that senus home that species of voter. we have just as much corruption here in North Carolina as they have. The trouble is with that genus homo, that species of voter to whom no amount of law means anything. The time has come when the power of money in politics is absolute. They spend millions in Pennsylvania and Illinois for an office that pays $10,000 a year and lasts but six years. They don't spend that much in North Carolina because they don't have to. But they do spend $250,000 in North Carolina, and if it becomes necessary to spend a million they will spend it.

"In Illinois, this man Insull, who has millions and millions and controls a dozen public utilities, frankly admitted that he contributed something to all of the parties in the contest. He gave George Brennan, the Democratic candidate $15,000, and George took it, because he said he needed it. He gave ten times as much to Smith, the Republican candidate. He did that because he wanted to be on the inside, no matter who won.

"We have got to get this in our minds—that a high spirit of citizenship is necessary for fairness in elections. I can take a high-spirited citizenship and handle an election without any laws; I can take a money-loving sorry citizenship and no amount of laws will prevent corruption.

will prevent corruption.

"We need an ironclad Australian ballot law and voting machines in North Carolina. I may be a little cynical, but I wouldn't trust a politician. We have got to preach the gospel of manhood in politics. They spend money to swing elections right here in Wake County. They said I was in on this last election, but I was not; I kept clear of the whole thing. But no less than 10 men came to my office during that campaign and asked for money to be used in controlling the vote. These were not ordinary, sorry-looking fellows who came up asking for $100, and they can and do control the vote. And if one candidate does not come across with the money, they will go around and talk to the other candidate. So that's the situation right here in Raleigh and Wake County. Wake County.

and Wake County.

"I have one comment to make on this situation—it can not last. If it does last, we will go to the dogs.

"This is supposed to be a progressive State, but it is the most backward of all, excepting possibly South Carolina, in the means of assuring a fair and accurate count of ballots. I say that our election and primary laws are not framed for the assurance of a fair election but for the purpose of enabling fraud to be perpetrated and of concealing the perpetrators.

"Mr. Bailey read section 5976 of the election laws governing the conduct of polling places, with the provision for privacy for the voters, etc., including the roping off of a walk way to the ballot boxes.

"Now, that's all very fine to read, but it has never happened in North Carolina. But this section has this provision: That nothing therein shall be construed as making it compulsory for the registrar and poll holders to rope off the walk way. Now, why was that proviso put in there? It was put in there by some smart politician. If it pays the dominant element in control of the precinct to rope off the walk way, it is roped off; if it doesn't pay to rope off the walk way, it isn't done. It's just a matter of which way they can get the most votes. That provision was put there in the interest of fraud and not in the interest of fairness. "Now, let's talk about the canvassing of returns. The people know a little more about that now on account of some recent experiences, including the Evans and Brassfield case. I will say this in connection with that case—that the State board of elections didn't decide anything for anybody; it did nothing in regard to either law, rule, or reason. It just decided to do nothing. But the law says that county boards of canvassers have the power of judicial determination of the issues before it, which is the same power possessed by the courts. In other words, the county boards are empowered to reach a decision, and there is no appeal, and thus the matter is disposed of.

"But the judges of elections are men who owe their appointment to the dominant political machine or element. They have got to get the backing of the ruling powers to hold their offices, and when they do get it, they are hard to dislodge.

"But it is worse in the primary than it is in the election. This law says that the county board of canvassers shall have authority to tabulate the returns, and that's all. In other words, if the returns from a precinct are written clearly and there is no apparent inaccuracy in the tabulation of the vote, all the county board can do is to certify the figures. The county board can not even get access to the ballot boxes unless somebody comes forward and shows there was an inaccuracy in wri they backed off and offered to compromise. They said they would withdraw their opposition provided this clause was inserted in the law; that the county board of canvassers shall have authority only to tabulate the returns. Which simply meant that the dominant political element could report the returns to suit themselves without challenge unless somebody showed an inaccuracy in the report. I am profoundly ashamed of this state of affairs; and nothing has been done since 1913 to remedy it. The election law we have was drawn in 1901 and nothing has been done since that time to remedy its defects.

we have was drawn in 1901 and nothing has been done since that time to remedy its defects.

"The election law at the time it was framed in 1901 had a simple unfortunate thing to justify it—the negro situation. I firmly believe that it is the policy of this State that its affairs should be dominated and run by the whites; and it ought to be that way. But we fell by the wayside in 1893, and the State went to the Republican Populists by about from 30,000 to 40,000 majority. But in 1898 we got back in the saddle, and in 1901 Aycock came in and the task of writing an election law that would prevent a similar situation in the future was undertaken. But although it is a good gun to have behind the door, the law now is not being used to keep out the negro but to keep the people in power who controlled the election machinery regardless of the strength of the opposition. This situation can not be remedied until the people rise and demand a test vote.

rise and demand a test vote.

"We also have on the statute books the absentee voters' law. "We also have on the statute books the absentee voters' law. That law was put there in time of war, so that the soldiers who went to France could have an opportunity to vote. I think that was the right thing to do. But now the soldiers have come back, and the law stays on the books. Why? Because in any election or primary anybody with control over the registrars and poll holders can go to any precinct in the State and vote any number of votes he wants to. I believe it can be proved that cigarette coupons have been cast as ballots and counted under such circumstances. That ended it, for there was no way to attack the returns."

> CAUSES OF CIVIC CRASH—THE INIQUITY OF RING RULE Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D.

The second thing responsible for our crash is the principle of ring rule. That is a principle of American politics, not only in Asheville but throughout the county; one of the principles of American politics, and the root of it, is the life of the ring. There are men who cast covetous eyes on public moneys. That is the beginning of the ring. Birds of a feather flock together. These men who have covetous eyes on public money are combined into a ring in order to carry out their purposes. The ring is very men who have covetous eyes on public money are combined into a ring in order to carry out their purposes. The ring is very compact. The cement is the love of money.

We have had one in Asheville, as you know. They are men who are in the game for political power and political plunder. They want political power in order that they may get political plunder. How do they go at it? They know that the custodians of the public funds are elected. Therefore they begin at the very beginning—with elections. They begin to corrupt the ballot. I am not telling any secret about the corruption of the ballot here in this county and in Asheville. It is well known.

Where does it begin? In the primaries, Why? Because under normal conditions there is a dominating party here. It is a fore-normal conditions there is a dominating party here. It is a fore-gone conclusion under normal conditions that its nominees are going to be elected. Therefore they center their efforts on the primaries. If they can get men nominated that they think they can handle, then they think they have accomplished their purposes. I do not mean that there always is a bargain between them, but they make their selection as to what men are to be nominated. I have evidence—sworn evidence of the corruption of the primaries.

For instance, we have an absentee law, whereby under certain restrictions people who are absent or physically unable to go to the polls are enabled to vote. This thing is abused and perverted in a shameful way. There have been people, I doubt not, who voted the absentee ballot who were absent from this planet, and it could not be known where they were. And no medium was present to communicate with them as to how they wanted their votes cost. These observables did not vote they were voted through votes cast. These absentees did not vote; they were voted through corruption of the ballot by the ring.

Another thing I want to hit hard. I understand that under the laws of this State all the registrars are of the dominant party, whatever that party may be. Whenever a party is ashamed to let the other party know what it is doing in the matter of registrations, that party is rotten to the heart. It means that the dominant party would manipulate, if necessary, the registration books. Why this law? Because the dominant party keeps it for its own corrupt nurposes.

its own corrupt purposes

That is the party to which I belong. I wish a number of you That is the party to which I belong. I wish a number of you Democrats would come out and say you won't stand for this any longer; that no party can select registrars of its own party alone. Who is responsible? You Democrats, every one! You are responsible until it is repealed. You have the stain upon your own hands. Do not try to put it on somebody else. How many of you do it? How many of you refuse to stand for things you know are evil, the corruption of the ballot and the manipulation for this in party interests, largely under the control of the ring I have spoken of?

[The News and Observer, Raleigh, N. C., Friday, January 30, 1931] WOULD ABOLISH ABSENTEE BALLOTING IN BUNCOMBE

The house committee on elections yielded to the plea of Buncombe County yesterday for repeal of the absentee ballot law in so far as it affected the local elections of that county, voting unanimously to report favorably on the Howell-Reed bill, but not until after argument had waxed warm for an hour and a half and Representative Neal, of McDowell, had served notice that he regarded the procedure as dangerous precedent and would vote against any similar proposal for other counties.

No county is at present exempt under the state-wide absentee.

No county is at present exempt under the state-wide absentee ballot act, and opposition in the committee was overridden only after representatives of Buncombe County had represented that the bill was fostered in dire necessity to meet a situation for which no other remedy was apparent.

The bill was properly only before the house committee, but it was heard in joint meeting in order that members of the senate committee might hear the Buncombe residents without the necessity of them returning for another meeting when the bill reached sity of them returning for another meeting when the bill reached the senate.

Opponents of exempting any county from the state-wide measure brought out that a bill was now being prepared by Attorney General Brummitt that would tighten up the general statute, and the Buncombe delegation was asked if it would not be satisfactory for its measure to go over pending consideration of that bill, but they told the committee that nothing would save the situation in Buncombe.

Aroung against submitting the bill to a subcommittee, as moved Arguing against submitting the bill to a subcommittee, as moved by Representative Dosher, of New Hanover, Judge J. Frazier Glenn, member of the Citizens and Taxpayers League of Buncombe County, declared that immediate action was essential for relief of a state of "turmoil and strife," adding, "if we can pass this tomorrow, it will do more to reestablish ourselves than anything

"It is the opinion of 95 per cent of the people of Asheville that the absentee ballot is at the bottom of the present political and financial condition of Buncombe County," he said, in response to a question from Representative Neal, from the adjoining county of McDowell, as to why he considered it so urgent to repeal the law for Buncombe.

"It has permitted a political situation that is intolerable," he declared, brandishing petitions with thousands of names, and declaring that not a voice had been heard against the measure. He said that the petitions were signed by Republicans and Democrats, and that the petitions were signed by Republicans and Demo-crats, and that leaders in both parties were whole-heartedly for it. "If you turn your back on us you'll lose Buncombe to the Demo-cratic Party," he asserted, as Representative Neal again interrupted him to say that from his attendance upon the sinking-fund subcommittee he did not understand that all of Buncombe's troubles were due to the absentee ballot.

"It is all due to it," Judge Glenn retorted, "for without it we

"It is all due to it," Judge Glenn retorted, "for without it we would have had other officers." He pointed to the increase in Buncombe's public debt from less than $8,000,000 to $50,000,000 in eight years, figures more or less familiar to the general public since the financial debacle brought on by the Central Bank & Trust Co. crash this winter.

Mrs. M. H. Harris, prominent Asheville business woman and property owner and member of the Asheville League of Women Voters' organization, minced no words in telling of abuses, stating that Asheville had many sanatoriums and that their patients had been voted regularly without their knowledge and persons dead five years were continuing to vote.

"In the name of the Lord don't let's defer it. Let us go back and tell the people of Buncombe County to take heart," she declared.

Judge Carl B. Hyatt, of the Buncombe Juvenile Court, pleaded for the measure as a matter of simple justice to voters who wanted to continue being "good Democrats."

Representative James Howell, sponsoring the bill, waxed frank about the political features of the measure, a subject treated as thin ice at first, but brought directly into the open as the argument progressed.

"If our banks had burst before the election, the Democratic Party would have been swept off the face of the earth in Buncombe," he said, pleading that it was his political funeral if the folks back home weren't for it, and asking deference of the com-notice to a great local emergency, despite their apparent disinclination to allow any county to get out of the state-wide law.

Representative Mark Reed indorsed the stand of his colleague, declaring that at best there was no need for the absentee ballot in Buncombe.

Mr. Howell brought out that the proposed measure had been published in Asheville papers and had brought no protest. Judge Glenn admitted that the trouble had been in the primary and Mr. Neal wanted to know if it would not be sufficient to abolish the absentee voting for the primary only.

"That would be to turn the county over to the Republicans," Representative Howell declared.

Representative Butler, of Sampson, Republican, then submitted an amendment to also abolish absentee voting in Sampson, and Representative McBee, of Mitchell, the minority leader, spoke for the Buncombe measure as a matter of local justice. He said if he were playing politics he would lean the other way.

Mr. Butler redirected attention to his amendment, which was ruled out of order, and Mr. Neal found in the Republican move an illustration of political consequences he had been suggesting.

"You see already where the thing will lead," he snorted.

Mr. Butler quickly resumed his feet to deny that he was playing politics, but offered his amendment as a matter if principle. Previously he had spoken for the Buncombe bill.

Senator Bernard appeared for the Buncombe bill.

Senator Bernard appeared for the bill, declaring it was necessary to restore confidence, and Representative McDevitt, of Madison, well known in western North Carolina Democratic politics, argued that the Buncombe delegation should have the bill if it wanted it. Representative Howell stated that the bill had the indorsement

Representative Howell stated that the bill had the indorsement of J. Ed. Swain, chairman of the county board of elections, and former Superior Court Judge T. L. Johnson.

The unanimously favorable vote followed withdrawal by Representative Dosher of his motion that it go to subcommittee.

The bill will be reported out this morning, and it is regarded that it will be the center of a hot battle on the floor unless some compromise is effected in the meanwhile.

NOTABLE PUBLIC SERVICE

Yesterday's dispatch from Lumberton reported that Judge Sinclair had ordered the Robeson County grand jury to investigate conditions surrounding the primaries of June 2 and June 30, and this statement follows: "The charge, which was the second of the term of the court, came on the morning after the appearance in the Lumberton Robesonian of the afternoon before of a summary of the charges that had been brought to its attention of corruption in the primary here June 30 to nominate a recorder for the Lumberton district."

A good deal has been said, first and last, about the Robeson primaries, but so far as noted here the reports have been vague. What the Robesonian reported "as charges freely made" and "brought to the attention of the Robesonian" is this:

That 10 more votes were cast in South Lumberton precinct than voters registered; that the same people in a number of instances voted in both North and South Lumberton precincts; that a citizen halted carloads of people in Britts No. 1, placing a marked ballot voted in both North and South Lumberton precincts; that a citizen halted carloads of people in Britts No. 1, placing a marked ballot and a dollar bill in the lap of each voter; that conditions were just as bad in Britts No. 2, but work more cleverly handled; that the registrar in one township took a number of voters to one side for alleged purpose of influencing vote, and it is alleged that vote was different in some instances from what it would have been had voters not been interfered with; that some county officials, after nomination, took active part in campaign; that when it became known that money had been placed in one town by became known that money had been placed in one town by partisans of one candidate, it was doubled by the other side; that a frightened boy came to Lumberton and asked what was going to be done with him, that he had been forced to vote in Britts No. 1, and was between 16 and 17 years old; accompanied by another youth, who appeared to be related, who said he was under age and was forced to vote in South Lumberton; that two girls and a boy, the oldest not over 19, were forced to vote in one township.

It is further related that between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning the residence of one J. B. Humphrey, in Saddle Tree Township, was destroyed by fire; that the fire had started on the outside, in was destroyed by fire; that the fire had started on the outside, in front where no fire had been in four weeks, and several hours after a heavy rain; that on the morning before the second primary, Humphrey, who was known to be a supporter of Recorder Kornegay (one of the candidates), found on his front porch a note reading as follows: "J. B. H. vote for Ivey or you'll wish you had"; and underneath was a neatly drawn bullet. Incidentally, 11 persons were sleeping in the residence. Many persons seem to think the fire was incendiary.

In the face of information of this nature, it is difficult to see how Judge Sinclair could have done otherwise than order the grand jury to investigate. But none the less, it is satisfying to know that a judge of his vigor was present to act so promptly.

The Daily News has no information as to the accuracy of the

The Daily News has no information as to the accuracy of the charges and naturally does not prejudge them. But the act of the Lumberton Robesonian in bringing them sharply to public attention and virtually forcing a grand-jury investigation is a notable example of public service. ELECTION LAWS COMMITTEE IS TOLD OF BUNCOMBE FRAUDS

Buncombe County's revolution, which hit several eminent citizens of the mountain metropolis and environs in November, reached Raleigh this afternoon and gave Senator Carlisle Higgins and his Raieign this afternoon and gave Senator Carlisle Higgins and his election laws committee a grand demonstration, the best of the session, on the Leavitt and Young proposal to repeal the absentee voters' act as it applied to Buncombe.

The revolutionists brought down Democrats mainly. True, they may not have been Democratic in November—nobody seemed to be. But they are has-been Jeffersonians. They came as witnesses to the multifarious rascality of elections in Buncombe. They appeared to be very much in earnest about this bill to repeal the absentee voters' act.

BIG GUNS THERE

The revolutionists brought Jack Westall, big lumberman; G. D. Carter, president of the Bank of West Asheville; Clarence Blackstock, lawyer; Percy Carter, lawyer; Junius G. Adams, Frazier

Glenn, W. H. Hipps, and George Craig, all lawyers; and Thomas Waddey Raoul. Nearly all of these citizens have been prominent in Democratic politics. Some of the visitors were Republicans, but most of them were "antiring" Democrats. The rough element was not represented to-day. The Taxpayers' League came along and some of the speakers to-day were representatives of that very potent band of protestants.

MR. WESTALL TELLS A GREAT DEAL

Mr. Westall, being a big business man, took the trouble to know most about which he was talking. He brought a pile of records and gave the contents to the committee. He told the committee that a detailed study had not been possible since the election of 1928. But he had some facts which must have been surprising to the committee. "Extreme methods were used" in several instances, he said; but always the absentee ballot got into the box. Sometimes an elector went up in person and voted in the regular way, only to find out that he had been voted in another precinct as an absentee. In some instances, he said, persons were voted in person in one precinct, then absentee in the same polling place.

"Cases were found where two absentee ballots were presented for the same person in the same precinct, one having been made up in Asheville and the other at some distant point," said Mr. Westall. "There are instances wherein mistakes were made in taking names from the registration books, but these names were writed as absentees nevertheless."

Mr. Westall told the committee that in some of the precincts large numbers of absentee ballots were destroyed after insistent objection had been made to their being voted. There were in the first precinct in Asheville about 125 of these absentee ballots which were not voted, he said, but taken out and destroyed. Thirty ballots in one precinct and about seventy in another were thrown out by the registrar. Inspection showed that many of the absentee certificates were signed by one and the same person, he said. The clumsy fabricator took no pains to disguise his foolish

FRAUD UPON THE WOMEN

He told how Miss Bonnie Franks, a school-teacher, was voted as an absentee, with Grady Turner as witness. She voted ballot 231 and did not authorize anybody to get her absentee ballot. Grady Turner is a fictitious name. R. L. Melton, former resident of Asheville, now living in Detroit, Mich., was voted twice in the precinct which was making Miss Franks so energetic. Melton was on the poll books as number 393 and 580. Both witnesses, C. F. Elemming and Robert Bridges are unknown.

Flemming and Robert Bridges, are unknown.

Mr. Westall gave one after another of these alleged frauds. They were backed up by affidavits, of which Mr. Westall appeared to have half a ton. The visitor gave witnesses and called names with great volubility. The Buncombe folks are merely asking to get repeal for themselves. Their bill applies only to their county.

PIDDLING BUSINESS

Not one gray hair in this devoted head was caused by anxiety over the confirmation of Charles A. Jonas or any other Republiover the confirmation of Charles A. Jonas or any other Republican—or Democrat—as district attorney or anything else in the gift of the Federal Government. One of the easiest things we have ever done was to take or leave the objects of political patronage. And yet we are, and have been since the inception of the argument, decidedly of the opinion that Senators Balley and Morrison were far better occupied with something vastly different from opposing the ratification by the Senate of Mr. Jonas. We are willing to accept as true the statement that Mr. Jonas has said some nasty things about Democrats in North Carolina and their manner of conducting elections. It is altogether likely that he can not begin to prove some of his charges. But what of it?

When did it become a cardinal political sin for a Republican—or Democrat—in these parts to overspeak himself? Is Mr. Jonas not capable? Is he a poor citizen, an undesirable neighbor? Does he pay his debts, confine his chickens to his premises, and keep his nose clean?

keep his nose clean?

There are many Democrats in North Carolina who ought to be talked about, and sometimes we think it would do the party as a whole good to have things said about and to it. We doubt seriously if Mr. Jonas has said anything harsher about the election manners of Mr. Balley and his friends than Mr. Balley has said—and might be in a better position to prove—concerning some of those who used to subdue the opposition to the Democratic machine in North Carolina.

Whis immediate restricts of the State over Mr. Jones pothing in

This immediate section of the State owes Mr. Jonas nothing in particular and we can not at this moment recall a personal obligation; but there are lots of things around Washington that a man of Mr. Balley's size and attainments might turn his hand to before he expends any of his energy in attempting to build a fire under the devil of partisanship.

PUNISHING MR. JONAS

While the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be prosecutor of the Federal court docket for the western district of North Caro-lina is yet to be acted upon by the Senate, the adverse report voted by that body's Judiciary Committee dims quite perceptibly

Mr. Jonas's chances for celebration over formal acquisition of the new job to which he was accorded a recess appointment by

With full allowance for the former House Member's injudicious and excessive loquacity, this household publication fails to see how the persistent opposition of Democratic Senators will add how the persistent opposition of Democratic Senators will add anything to the record or the sportsmanship, as if there were any such quality in politics, of their party. A Senator, with all the problems which are crying for attention and the opportunities for State and National service which now press upon him, could patently put his time, energy, and attention to far more useful purpose than diverting even a small portion of it to the more or less picayunish business of getting his man, particularly when the object of his attack is no more than one among hundreds of district attorneys who draw subsistence from the Federal pay roll.

dreds of district attorneys who draw subsistence from the Federal pay roll.

As to Mr. Jonas's unfitness for the position to which he was appointed, nothing has been said so far as has been noted in these parts. The appointee merely talked too much, a generally common fault, it must be admitted by his unfriends. Even so, it was not how much but what the prospective district attorney said. In his partisan zeal—or was it his enthusiasm for reform?—he made the mistake of casting reflection, real or fancied, upon North Carolina's election system and more particularly upon the Nye investigation committee for its designation as "refreshing" that which he conceived to be far therefrom; and for that reason he becomes "personally objectionable and obnoxious." For this criticism he must be punished.

Acceptance of the procedure as part of the political game does not, however, preclude wonderment as to how many officeholders would remain on the public pay roll were they held strictly accountable for all the statements which they made in their campaign utterances and partisan attacks.

JONAS INJUDICIAL

Senator Josiah W. Bailey, it would seem, is determined to balk Charles A. Jonas's confirmation as United States district attorney. The Daily News, which has referred to this matter aforetime and expressed the hope that Mr. Bailey would find some greater emprise with which to occupy his senatorial time, is inclined to let it drop. Nobody is better suited to the purpose of taking or leaving Federal appointees rewarded for service to either of the parties than is this household journal. We might even go so far as to accept Mr. Bailey's charge of "temperament" as partially proven and a little admitted by Mr. Jonas who has evidenced a parties than is this household journal. We might even go so far as to accept Mr. Balley's charge of "temperament" as partially proven and a little admitted by Mr. Jonas, who has evidenced a slight willingness to hedge.

And yet so constrained are we to the belief that it is not the under dog which should always be called upon to present the olive branch that we wish Mr. Balley would forget it all. Especially is this desire keen with relation to the Senator's insistence that Mr. Jonas has reflected upon the State judiciary. Personally we might feel inclined to yield to none in our admiration and respect of judges of inferior, superior, and supreme courts of this State and then with divers and sundry members of Mr. Jonas's party wonder how they got that way. If there is any branch of the government of North Carolina which a Republican has some cause to resent in its constitution and selection it is our boasted nonpartisan judiciary.

Nonpartisan because there is no chance for it to be bipartisan, as all hands insist the national judiciary must be! Five members of the supreme court—count 'em—five! Twenty of the superior court, with five or six spares, county and recorder court judges too tedious and numerous to mention, and not one Republican in the lot! How many justices of the peace or even notaries public vote the minority ticket in North Carolina?

The only argument which to our notion might serve to justify

The only argument which to our notion might serve to justify such a monopoly of the administration of justice would be the fact that the Democratic Party in this State furnishes all the court

And it does seem a little hard to blame Mr. Jonas for an occasional lapse into the injudicial when he has had such limited advantages.

[From the Charlotte Observer, Charlotte, N. C., July 15, 1931] JONAS'S CONFIRMATION

Charles A. Jonas holds the office of district attorney by virtue of a "recess" appointment by President Hoover, which means that his nomination must be confirmed at the next session of the Senate. The Observer can see no reason for objection to the Jonas appointment except on the single ground that he once defeated a Democratic candidate for the House. Objection on that ground would reduce the matter to a low scale of partisan politics, and of a kind it would not be profitable for the Democrats to engage in. Furthermore, it must be Jonas or some other Republican. No Democrat may hope to get the office held by Jonas, and, that being the case, Jonas should be indorsed for his record or "a better Republican" picked to succeed him. Then would come the difficulty of finding a Republican better qualified for the duties of district attorney than Jonas—and the Observer does not believe that can be done. Confirmation of the Jonas appointment is a circumstance of strong appeal to the people of the district he represented in his one term at Washington, for he proved resourceful of results, particularly for Charlotte. It is of record also that Jonas developed the broad mind, serving his district as a whole wherever he found opportunity to serve, with no partiality being !

wherever he found opportunity to serve, with no partiality being of manifestation.

The spirit of appreciation, rather than the spirit of partisanry, should obtain in the case of confirmation of the Jonas appointment. If it were a matter of Democratic opportunity, the Observer would contend for the Democrat, but there is no such opportunity involved. It is Jonas or some other Republican, and the Observer would want to see a good man, a capable lawyer, and a friend of the people of the district he represented rewarded. We believe the Democrats, as well as the Republicans of this district, would be glad to see Jonas confirmed and without political quibble.

This is another long-distance discussion in connection with candidates for the Senate and State offices, and might well be deferred until the time for action comes nearer, but in some way deferred until the time for action comes nearer, but in some way some folks appear to have come to believe that there is proposition on foot to oppose confirmation of the Jonas appointment, this belief probably being founded on the circumstance that Mr. Jonas has stated that in case his cause is turned down by the Senate, he would not accept another appointment at the hands of the President, in that event opening the way for successorship scramble among his party associates, with one contingent entry already in the field. Republican expectation is that both Senator Morarson and Senator Bailey will be inclined to oppose the Jonas nomination, but upon what ground belief of that kind is founded is not known. Neither Democratic Senator could oppose Jonas on the ground that he is not capable of prosecuting the duties of district attorney with ability, for his qualifications are beyond dispute, and they could oppose him only for partisan reasons, based, partly at least, as we have stated, on the political circumstance that he defeated a Democratic candidate, and furthermore, they could hope to see him succeeded only by a Republican. Because of facts of this kind, and because of Jonas's record for having done things of benefit to the people of his district, the Observer is disposed to discount any rumors that active opposition to the confirmation is in the brewing on part of the North Carolina Senators. And further, we have a feeling that December events will prove that this discount was well placed.

This is said in the light of our established belief that neither Morrison nor Bailey would oppose confirmation of Jonas for the mere satisfaction it would give in forcing the President to make a new nomination. some folks appear to have come to believe that there is proposition

You are exactly right.

I am not of Mr. Jonas's political party, but I believe he is well qualified for the post to which the President appointed him. A great many North Carolinians who are Democrats feel the same way about it.

The opposition to him of the two Senators from this State is, I feel sure, not representative of the best opinion in North Carolina. They have simply let their judgment be clouded—in my opinion—by partisan rancor.

I am well acquainted with Senator Balley and have a high regard for him, but I believe he is badly "off the track" in this

I used to know Mr. Jonas but have not seen him or heard from him in several years, and he knows nothing of my writing this letter. Yours truly,

[From the Chapel Hill (N. C.) Weekly, March 18, 1932] THE FITNESS OF JONAS

A dispatch from Washington a few days ago contained this passage:

"Senator Borah adheres to the view that if all the accusations against Jonas are true, they do not give rise to any question concerning his fitness to serve as a prosecuting officer."

BORAH is right.

Jonas is a vigorous partisan, and at times, in the manner of partisans, he is apt to indulge in rather extravagant talk about the virtues of his own gang and the sins of his opponents. A year or so ago he gave the Democrats of North Carolina a furious tongue-lashing. He said that they did not conduct elections fairly, and he intimated that anybody who went into a North Carolina court with a charge against Democratic election officials had little chance of winning his case. Furthermore, he cast aspersions upon the United States Senate investigation committee headed by Nys. All of which was very indiscreet for a man whose appointment to office was coming before the Senate for confirmation. confirmation.

Jonas's allegations against the Democrats aroused the ire of Senator Balley and Balley presented to the Judiciary Committee a long statement opposing confirmation. Finally he said that Jonas was personally obnoxious to him. Whereupon a majority of the committee voted against confirmation.

Jonas would have been wiser if he had controlled his tongue; but, as a matter of fact, what he said about the conduct of elections by Democrats in North Carolina was largely true—just as the same thing is true of Republicans in States where Repub-licans are in control of the machinery. Of course, Balley's own election was not the result of fraud; he won by far too great a election was not the result of fraud; he won by far too great a majority to justify any assumption of fraud. But for a generation or more there has been abundant—superabundant—crookedness in the conduct of elections in North Carolina, and every North Carolinian above the grade of a simpleton is aware of it.

But, as Borah says, this has nothing to do with Jonas's fitness for the job of United States prosecuting attorney in western North Carolina. If he is well qualified for the job—and thus far nobody has given any convincing evidence to the contrary—he ought to be confirmed. We hope he will be,

CHARLOTTE, N. C., March 5, 1932.

Senator SCHALL

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: I notice you have filed a minority report on Jonas's confirmation.

on Jonas's confirmation.

I am disgusted with politics. No sensible reason has or can be given why Jonas should not be confirmed. That he is competent and highly capable, that he is a man of most excellent character, will be admitted by everybody who knows him. Why then should he not be confirmed? Have we reached a point when men of ability and character can not be confirmed by the Senate? If Jonas is summarily kicked out, I want to say with much emphasis that it will be no reflection on him.

I might add that I am 61 years of age. I am a lifelong Democrat. Jonas doesn't know I am writing this letter.

Yours truly.

Yours truly,

PLUMMER STEWART.

WILMINGTON, N. C., March 2, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,

Hon. Thomas D. Schall,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: The writer takes this privilege of writing you to express the thanks of the people of the State of North Carolina for the splendid manner in which you handled the case of the nomination of the Hon. Charles A. Jonas to be United States district attorney for the western district of this State.

As you are aware, there is no criticism as to the ability, integrity, and statisfications of Mr. Jonas but rather some states of this state.

and qualifications of Mr. Jonas, but rather some statements attributed to him during the heat of political battle. Mr. Jonas is at this time Republican national committeeman from this State and this time Republican national committeeman from this State and has served one term in Congress to the credit of North Carolina.

The good people down here feel that this man should not be sacrified just to satisfy the spleen of Senator Balley, who has in times past, when unsuccessful, just as strongly condemned the Democratic machine in the State, and whose seat in the Senate is now being contested for alleged irregularities at election time.

Your legion of friends in this State appreciate your efforts and admire your sense of fair play.

Yours very truly,

V. W. FAGG.

HICKORY, N. C., March 4, 1932.

Senator SCHALL.

HICKORY, N. C., March 4, 1932.

Senator Schall.

Dear Sie: The matter of Hon. C. A. Jonas just came down to this—why should you crucify one of your own members for what you would probably have done yourself if you had been in his place? Mr. Jonas may have been a little indiscreet in the use of words—who is not, under wrath of righteous indignation?

Mr. Jonas just vigorously exposed a fraud Senator Balley, in a public statement, claimed he could commit!

Are you willing to keep your party down in this State forever by approving the absentee ballot law as it exists here?

Suppose the Democrats in New York State had control of the legislative branches of the State as well as the governor. Would all that corruption in New York City ever been exposed? Now, your party has a chance to get ahead in this State under fair elections. Are you going to crush those chances by sacrificing one of your strongest leaders for a little indiscretion of words?

The last Republican administration couldn't be so bad in this State if Senator Balley lent his aid and influence to it by serving under it, could it?

I am a Democrat; voted the straight Democratic ticket over 50 years, but I am of the type of Borah; I am in favor of honest elections no matter which party it helps!

Yours for good government,

C. G. Whiting.

C. G. WHITING.

Mr. MORRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I feel that the presentation of the case would not be complete without an answer from the record to the question asked me by the Senator from Georgia, and if the Senator from North Carolina yield, I should like to read what is said with respect to the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield for that purpose?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the attention of Mr. Jonas was called to the article published by Mr. Bryant, giving what Jonas had said when he was asked what was meant by the Pritchard contest, and he had said that that was the first answer he had to make to the attacks made on him by Senator Morrison. Mr. Bryant writes about it in the News and Observer of March 8, 1931, as follows:

Mr. Jonas added:

Mr. Jonas added:

"Immediately after the adjournment of the Senate, H. E. C. Bryant, correspondent of the Raleigh News and Observer, called me over the telephone and asked the significance of the Pritchard contest. I replied that it would serve as one answer to Morrison's so-called charges against me, in that it will give a limited opportunity for the people of North Carolina to learn whether there have been wholesale frauds committed in our elections, as I believe, or whether the elections have been fair and honest, as contended by Senator Morrison. But I warned Mr. Bryant that this statement was not for publication, and he promised me he would not publish it, because I told him I intended to give out a statement in a day or two covering the entire subject. His statement that I said the Pritchard contest was a part of my answer to Senator Morrison was unjustified by any remark made by me to him. It was distinctly understood that what I said to him was not a part of an interview, nor given to him for publication."

Now, Mr. Bryant continues:

Mr. Jonas is in error as to my understanding about my talk with him. I asked him if he would have a statement to give out that day, and he said he would not. He volunteered the suggestion about the Pritchard contest, and I did not break any pledge to him by using it. Mr. Jonas has been frank in his conversations with me, and I had no idea he did not want the few sentences he uttered to be published. I am sure I did not misunderstand him. misunderstand him.

Mr. Jonas was interrogated about that, and his answers in relation to the matter will be found at page 12 of the record, from which I read as follows:

Mr. Jonas. Mr. Bryant called me on the telephone, and I went to the cloak room, and he asked me if I had a statement to give out with reference to the Pritchard contest. That is as I recall. I told him I did not, but I also told him I would have a statement with reference to the matter. I think Mr. Bryant asked me what was the connection between the Pritchard contest and the failure of my confirmation. That is as well as I remember it. I do not of my confirmation. That is as well as I remember it. I do not pretend to remember just what was said, but I know I told Bryant I had no statement to go out. Something I had no statement to go out. Something was said about the connection between the two, and he reports that I said that it was a part of my answer to the charges against my confirmation. was a part of my answer to the charges against my confirmation. I never said it was any part of my answer. I may have said—he may have said or I may have said—that it would be considered or might be construed or it would serve as an answer to the charges made against me, and whatever I said, Mr. Bryant says, he did not understand that it was not for publication, but I certainly told him I had no statement for publication, but I do not know whether he understood that or not. There is no controversy between him and me. Whatever he says I said I will agree to tween him and me. Whatever he says I said I will agree to. I have no definite recollection about it, except that whatever I may have said, I did not mean to infer or leave the impression that there was any connection whatsoever between my failure of confirmation and the Pritchard contest,

If the Senator from North Carolina will indulge me just a little farther, I feel that I ought to supplement what has been said by a reference to the record in justification of what I have told the Senate, namely, that Mr. Jonas does not even contend that there were any expenditures either corruptly made or in any excessive amount in the State of North Carolina that would call for any investigation by the Nye committee. I read from pages 3, 4, and 5 of his testimony, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Could you tell us, Mr. Jonas, in what respect the revised draft differed from the draft which appears to have been published?

Mr. Jonas. Senator, the revised draft that I prepared simply left out all the personal references, practically left out the first two paragraphs of the article. If you will read that article, you will note, Senator, that the first two paragraphs have no direct connection with the other parts of the article, and I was not interested in that part of it, but, as I say, the entire data had been prepared over a period of time, and it is not all in that issue of the paper. The issue of the 14th continued the statement. It is guite a long statement about election conditions in North is quite a long statement about election conditions in North Carolina.

The Chairman. Just let us see. I read:

"Representatives of the Nye committee continue to assemble evidence of the alleged frauds in the 1930 primary and general election in North Carolina."

This purports to be your statement. Mr. Jonas. Yes, sir. The Chairman (reading):

"What the committee will finally do about the North Carolina situation no one seems to know. I have never met or spoken to Senator Nye, or any other member of the committee, in my life. I have never believed Senator Nye intends to seriously investigate the North Carolina case, if he can help it."

Mr. Jonas. May I explain that? The Chairman. Yes.

Mr. Jonas. What I meant by that is this: So far as the reports showed—that is, the reports in the North Carolina newspapers—Senator Nyz was under the impression that the charge in North Carolina related to excessive expenditure of campaign funds, and that he never, so far as the newspaper reports went—Senator Nyz had never seemed to have understood that in our State the charge with reference to elections did not relate to excessive campaign expenditures. The CHAIRMAN. Did you not understand, Mr. Jonas, that that was what he was called upon to investigate?

Mr. Jonas. I did not; no, sir."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that whereas Mr. Jonas, at that point in his statement, stated that he did not know, within five minutes thereafter he said twice that he did know?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was about to read that. I continue the quotation from the record:

The Chairman. Did you not understand, Mr. Jonas, that that was what he was called upon to investigate?
Mr. Jonas. I did not; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the resolution would have advised you about that.

about that.

Mr. Jonas. Well, of course, you know, Senator—
The Charrman (interposing). He was called upon simply to investigate campaign expenditures?
Mr. Jonas. Yes, sir.
The Charrman. That is all.
Mr. Jonas. And that is where I was laboring under a misapprehension. That is what I did not know.
The Charrman. You say:
"I have never believed Senator Nye intends to seriously investigate the North Carolina case if he can help it. If the Democrats did not pay him to come to the State, and without any serious effort to secure evidence, give out a statement that the situation in the State is refreshing, then they at least owe him a debt of gratitude." gratitude.

Did you understand that Senator NyE came to your State for the purpose of investigating frauds in the election in your State outside of campaign expenditures?

Mr. Jonas. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you get that impression, Mr. Jonas?

Mr. Jonas. I got it from all the newspapers of the State, and from all the information that ever I had with reference to frauds in the State. I never had any information—

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). This is the third time an investigation was carried on. There was the Senator Reed investigation, the Senator Steiwer investigation, and this investigation?

Mr. Jonas. Yes.

Mr. JONAS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in 1926, 1928, and 1930. The investigations involved the Vare and Pepper expenditures in Pennsylvania. They involved the expenditures in the Smith case in Illinois. Farther back, they involved the Senators in the State of Michigan. You were in the House at that time, were you not?

Michigan. You were in the House at that time, were you not?

Mr. Jonas. Yes. sir.

The Chairman. Well, how could you fail to know that it was campaign expenditures that were being investigated by the Nye committee, Mr. Jonas?

Mr. Jonas. As I said to you, Senator, the situation in North Carolina was different from what it was in Pennsylvania, and I never knew that there were any charges, so far as North Carolina was concerned, with reference to the expenditures of large sums of money, but all the charges that ever I heard with reference to the North Carolina conditions—

The Chairman (interposing). If you had not heard anything at

The Chairman (interposing). If you had not heard anything at all about corrupt expenditures of the money in North Carolina, what you did hear was as to frauds of an entirely different char-

Mr. Jonas. That is correct.

Now, I want to make a further statement. Attention has been called by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] to a speech made by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley] in 1926, in which he assailed with some vigor the election laws of the State of North Carolina. That is called to our attention by Mr. Jonas as a justification for his assailing the laws of North Carolina in his letter.

Of course, whether the laws of North Carolina in relation to elections were subject to attack by Senator Balley in 1926, or by Mr. Jonas in 1930, is entirely beside the question. Nobody is complaining about Mr. Bailey because of his attack on the election laws of North Carolina. The complaint is about these matters to which I have called attention—the attack upon Senator NyE and his committee, and upon the Senate of the United States, and his statement, in effect, that the Pritchard contest was introduced here for the purpose of influencing the confirmation of his nomination. Those are the two charges; but the fact about the matter is that Senator Balley did make a vigorous speech attacking the North Carolina election laws in 1926. and was elected to the legislature, and had the laws amended and perfected as he, Senator Balley, thought they ought to be. Mr. Jonas, however, did not like the laws the enactment of which Senator Bailey procured, and he proceeded to attack them in that form in 1930. We were left with the impression, however, until we were corrected about the matter, that Senator Balley had been attacking the laws in exactly the same way as they were assailed by Mr. Jonas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the question here is not a question of liberty of speech, as was suggested just now by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Schall]. If it were a question of liberty of speech, I question whether any Senator here would go farther in the interest of that liberty than I would go. But the question here is whether the utterances of Mr. Jonas tend to sustain the objections which have been filed against his confirmation, tend to sustain the report made by the committee, and tend to disqualify him for the office of United States attorney.

I am going to be very brief. I am going to discuss, first, the newspaper utterance of January 13, 1930. Under what circumstance was that utterance made? It was in writing. It is printed in quotations in the Greensboro News. It utters what is conceded here to be a libel upon a committee of the United States Senate.

Say what you may in the interest of freedom of speech, no one will say that we have freedom to utter libels. I think that meets just the point of the eloquent sentences of the Senator from Minnesota.

Again, Mr. Jonas, in this article, attacks the courts of the Commonwealth of North Carolina, and, so far as I am concerned, that is the gravamen of his offense. I do not hesitate to say that if he had attacked me personally I would not have filed objections to him on that account. If he had reflected upon me in a political campaign, I would have taken it as in the ordinary course of politics. If he had very greatly offended me personally, I can not conceive that I would be willing, and I do not think in the term that I shall serve here I shall ever be willing, to use the high privilege that is vested in a matter of this sort by way of venting anything that is personal or anything that is political. I hope the years which are to follow will justify the statement I have made.

When Mr. Jonas, however, publishes to the world that justice can not be had in the courts of the Commonwealth which I represent here with my distinguished colleague, that is personally obnoxious to me; I resent it, I abhor it, and it moves me to throw everything I have in the way of personal resentment against the exaltation of the man who will deliberately utter words tending to bring obloquy and disgrace upon the courts of the Commonwealth of North Carolina.

That is plain language. But I say here the most precious possession of my Commonwealth is the honor of its courts and the confidence of its people in the administration of justice there.

Was the accusation of Mr. Jonas wanton? His own statement to the committee admits that he had no evidence and that he knew of no dereliction of duty.

The next statement was uttered with respect to the State of North Carolina to a committee of the Senate of the United States and with respect to a group of Senators, using language which I will not repeat here, and the innuendo is inserted as to the likelihood or the suggestion of corruption of a committee of the Senate, without the slightest provocation. What was the alleged provocation? What had been going on in the month of January, 1931, to induce Mr. Jonas to publish this statement?

The Nye committee had visited the State of North Carolina in October. It had made no report, and if it had made no report, what is the justification for suggesting that it had been bought, or ought to have been bought? What is the justification for the statement that it had entered into a whitewashing proceeding? What was the provocation? I can not imagine. But I assert that the use of that language, without provocation, ought to convince every Senator that the man who used it is unfit to occupy the high office of United States attorney in any district in any State. It was wanton, it was uncalled for, it was unjustified, and Mr. Jonas himself does not at any point in his defense undertake to justify it.

He says that he undertook to recall it. I would like to be able to take at face value the utterance of every man who speaks to me and of every witness who takes the stand; but when Mr. Jonas tells me that he undertook to withdraw that statement, and I know that he was a Member of Congress at the time, and that he could have sent a wire to Greensboro in three minutes, or could have called up the editor of that paper in 30 seconds by the long-distance phone and have requested the editor not to print it—when he tells me that he tried to recall it, but does not say that he sent a wire or a phone message, I am tempted to pass by his statement with a contemptuous silence; and it is very kindly to treat it in that way, and that is the kindliest way in which one can treat it.

Let us go farther. Mr. Jonas came voluntarily before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. He made his statement, and the statement is in the record, and I wish Senators here to test the statement and to test the mental and moral constitution of the man, and his fitness for the position, on the statement he makes in extenuation and in defense of the newspaper article complained of. I will stake the case upon the statement of Mr. Jonas in his own defense.

On page 4, responding to the matter of the limitations upon the Nye committee, when the Senator from Montana had called attention to the fact that the committee had the right only to investigate expenditures, he declared, "That is what I did not know." He said he was laboring under a misapprehension. The minority of the committee has founded its report in his favor upon this alleged misapprehension. But when the Senator from Montana read to Mr. Jonas a newspaper statement by Mr. Jonas which indicated that Mr. Jonas did know of this limitation, Mr. Jonas, as appears on page 7, said, "Well, I knew."

Remember, his defense was, "I did not know." But when the evidence was presented to him that he must have known, he admitted that he did know.

On page 11 he again reiterated, "Yes; I knew." I leave that just where it is. He either told the truth when he said he did not know, or he told the truth when he said he did know, but he could not have told the truth both times.

Again, on page 6, this gentleman, who, at the time, was a Member of the Congress of the United States, presumed to be intelligent, when his attention was called to this use of a string of adjectives, with an epithet which I do not care to repeat, said he would swear he did not know the application of that epithet, that he would swear he did not know it had ever been applied to any particular group of Senators of the United States. If so, he is the only human being on earth over 10 years of age who knew of that expression and did not know of the circumstances of its use and its application. Yet he offered to take an oath that he knew nothing about it.

Then, on page 5, he stated that he told the representative of the Nye committee that he had no data on the subject of fraud or subjects of investigation by the Nye committee in North Carolina. "I told him I had no data."

On page 17 he said, "I have a cabinet full of evidence." I can not reconcile those two statements.

Again, on page 9—and this is another Jonas statement—he said, "I do not know of an indecent one [official] in the the solicitors of the courts in North Carolina, there being 18 of them, would do their duty, they would wake the dead.

The next point: On page 4 he said he never believed Senator NyE intended seriously to investigate.

On page 18 he said:

Never was there a plainer case of an attempt to whitewash.

On page 18 he said:

As an investigation * * * it was painful, pitiful, and puerile.

On page 18:

He is a fiend for publicity.

On page 9:

I never charged the Nye committee with any dereliction of duty

The only thing we can make out of that-well, I leave it to the Senate.

Is a man who would contradict himself that way, who would use language that is grossly insulting, and who then will come and say, "I never meant to charge the Nye committee with any dereliction of duty," after he had said, "There never was a plainer case of an attempt to whitewash" and suggested that we ought to have paid him if we did not pay him, and then say he meant nothing insulting, fit to hold this high office? I shall argue that as an indication that he did not have enough intelligence to be a district attorney and that he did not give the Senate committee credit for having enough intelligence to understand a plain contradiction.

I deny that I have ever in word, in thought, or words meant to question the integrity of the Nye committee.

In the name of our mother tongue and our capacity to understand our mother tongue, what did he mean?

I have said it was never in my mind.

On page 5 he said:

Mr. Ward talked to me.

Mr. Ward was one of the attachés of the Nye committee. On the same page he said:

No representative of the Nye committee ever talked to me.

I submit the committee will never know whether any representative of it did or did not talk to Mr. Jonas-not from Mr. Jonas-because of the fact that on the same page he states it in two different ways.

As to the Pritchard contest, here are his statements. The first statement he made is this:

This is the first part of my answer to attacks by Senator

The singular commentary there is that there had been no attack by my colleague [Mr. Morrison], who had merely filed a newspaper statement and had entered his objection. So his statement of his motives falls to the ground.

His second statement was:

I said it was part of my answer.

His third statement was this:

I said it would serve as one answer.

His fourth statement was this:

I said part of my answer.

His fifth statement was this:

Whatever Mr. Bryant says I said, I said.

His sixth statement:

Mr. Bryant's statement that the Pritchard contest was part of my answer was unjustified.

I am citing these matters as going to show the mental and moral characteristics of the man whose nomination is before the Senate.

Mr. President, in conclusion may I say that it is not an agreeable thing for me to stand in the way of anybody's promotion or anybody's interest. I would infinitely rather stand here and advocate the confirmation of the appoint-whole State," and so forth. Yet on page 8 he said that if | ment of any human being than to be put in the position of opposing it.

I have nothing personal against Mr. Jonas in any personal way. But when he undertakes to bring my Commonwealth into obloquy; when he publishes in the newspapers wantonly and without provocation the statement that justice can not be had in North Carolina in an election case, with no evidence to support him, when we all know that contestedelection cases in North Carolina are put at the head of the docket and do not take their place in the ordinary run of cases, that a quo warranto proceeding takes precedence over every other case that is brought in order that there may be expedition; when as a matter of fact criminal actions in North Carolina are tried almost invariably within the third or fourth month after the indictment; when, so far as I know, the State's good name has never been successfully impeached in this respect at any rate; when he utters language of that sort and comes here asking to be placed in the position of United States district attorney in a court there which is to deal along with the other courts in the State, he, as the prosecuting attorney on the part of the United States, having impeached the character and the good faith of the 18 prosecuting attorneys in the superior courts of the Commonwealth, then I consider that I would not be doing my duty either to my State or to the United States Government or to myself if I did not say that on account of his own utterances he is disqualified; and on account of the utterance attacking the character of the courts in my State I must submit that he is personally and his appointment and his confirmation are personally obnoxious to me. I would be unwilling to go back and look the people of North Carolina in the face if I took any other position.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I heard somewhat indistinctly a portion of what the Senator said. I want to ask the specific question whether or not, after having submitted this case in all its phases, he is willing to stand on the floor of the Senate and make the statement that this nomination is personally offensive and personally obnoxious to him?

Mr. BAILEY. I made that statement and explained exactly why-not personal in a personal sense and with no intention whatever to use any power or privilege in this body in a personal way, but personal in the sense that he has offended against my Commonwealth wantonly and un-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have some doubt as to whether I ought to address the Senate on this occasion on this subject. I am aware that all human beings are susceptible to influence and that none are free from sometimes being influenced, even unconsciously, to the extent that it may be that their personal feelings override their more sober judgment. At the outset I want to state to the Senate frankly that while I am unconscious of it, I realize that we are often prejudiced unconsciously, and I think it is fair, if anything that I say has any weight with any Senator, that he should judge and pass upon what I say, knowing from my own personal experience, while it does not appear in the record in this case, that it may be I am a biased

Mr. President, I was the author of the resolution under which the Nye committee were appointed and under which they acted and from which they obtained all their authority and jurisdiction. Although it turned out afterwards that one of the major investigations took place in my own State and in which I had a personal and direct interest, I was of course unaware that such a thing would happen. It never occurred to me when I prepared and introduced the resolution that such a thing would happen.

I saw the Nye committee in action. I saw them ridiculed. I read innuendos and slighting remarks that were made about them in my own State by newspapers and politicians. Some of the leaders in both political parties and some of the prominent men who had held high office, even the highest within the gift of the State, the governorship, said things about the Nye committee casting reflection upon | their honesty and upon the resolution under which they

Then I saw the Nye committee, or two members of it, a subcommittee consisting of the chairman of the committee [Mr. NyE] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Dale], when they were trying to unearth one of the foulest and most disreputable and dishonorable and filthy schemes that had ever been put up in the political history of my State. I saw them fail to get any evidence. I saw them come into the State again and fail again, to a great extent surrounded by men who it was afterwards shown were guilty of crime and small things that would bring disgrace to the commonest wriggling, writhing, crawling snake in the grass. I saw all those things heaped upon them and happen to them, and I saw them finally when they uncovered to some extent this dirty, vile political scheme, and brought forth into the open and into the presence of all the citizens of the State and of the United States some of the true facts that developed and showed this political conspiracy which I have just mentioned.

I saw those two Senators surrounded by influences from both political parties which would have been almost enough to discourage anyone and cause him to go out of the State and quit. But I saw them return; I saw them continue and continue against these odds until they commenced to turn up the corners and find the slimy, disreputable perjurers who had been trying to disfranchise the voters of an entire State.

Perhaps, as I said, because I came to have an interest in that particular investigation, some of the things that admittedly had happened, disgraceful and dishonorable-and incidentally they never developed or got any of the truth until after the primary-have caused me to be somewhat biased. During that memorable primary some of those disreputable and obnoxious acts were charged publicly to me. Naturally I had a deep feeling.

I saw that subcommittee afterwards connect with parts of that dirty political scheme men high in the official positions of the party to which I belong. I saw them in Washington tear off the slimy and dirty clothing of a member of the executive committee of a great political party. I saw them in the capital of my State where one bit of evidence after another finally led them up to some of the most prominent men in the political party of which I was a member, men who all the time, of course, knew what the dirty scheme was and who were to blame for it, who had sat in silence as witness after witness was placed upon the stand by these two Senators in an effort to show who the guilty parties were. I saw those prominent men remain silent, as dumb as posts. Only after the evidence had been gradually unearthed, not until they were coupled with this disreputable conspiracy, did they come forward and admit the truth. I say, "Admit the truth." They admitted the truth only so far as it had been developed. From Washington, where the mask was finally torn from the countenance of Lucas, all the way back to Chicago, through the city of Lincoln, and 200 miles west of that, little by little the evidence developed and showed, in part at least, who was to blame and who was behind the corrupt, damning, disgraceful, unpatriotic, treasonable action of men who before had stood high among their fellows. Men who were prominent as financiers and bankers, who were active in the Boy Scout movement. one of them a teacher of the greatest Sunday-school class in the entire State, finally admitted that it was their fundsthey said the funds were theirs-that oiled this corrupt machine.

From the beginning until the investigation ended I saw, read, and heard slurs and innuendoes cast upon Senator Nye and upon Senator Dale, who sat there, it seemed to me. incorruptible, undefiled, and unafraid, with a courageous determination to get the truth no matter where it led; and it led them into avenues where they never suspected the truth would lead them, into avenues high up, even next to the

Mr. President, it may be that I conceived in my mind and stood up under it all, who went through it all, and who bravely, courageously, and honestly brought out the truth, so far as they were able to bring it out. So when from some other quarter comes a slanderous statement against the Nye committee, it may be that I am unduly moved; it may be that I ought to remain silent; but, Mr. President, I still believe that there is something greater involved in this issue than my personal feelings, than my personal welfare, or the personal feelings or welfare of the members of the Nye committee. I believe that there is a fundamental principle involved, namely, the maintenance of honest elections according to the laws of the several States through the medium of publicity given to every attempt to nullify those laws and the effort to bring to justice, if possible, those who are guilty of frauds and crimes against the laws of our country; for, after all, Mr. President, we claim to be a republic, and the success of our Government depends upon one thing more than any other, and that is that at the bottom of our governmental structure elections shall be honest and fair and

That was the issue involved-to keep elections pure and above disrepute-when I introduced the resolution. I take it, that that was what was in the heart and the mind of every Senator when he voted for it, and in your mind, Mr. President. when you appointed the committee to carry out the mandate of the Senate. We wanted to keep our elections pure, because we knew that if they are not kept pure, if the fundamental corner stones of our Government are corrupt, then the governmental edifice will eventually topple and crumble into decay. That is what is involved, and when the Senate appoints a committee to go out and see that that is done, if we are not to defend it when it is slandered, when it is misrepresented. when innuendoes of all kinds are made against it, how do we expect the people of the United States to have any respect for it or for us? How are we going to preserve the purity of our elections if, when we appoint a committee to go out and do something to help keep them pure, we are then going to let those who have perhaps a direct interest, perhaps a fraudulent interest, in the result of elections, hold the committee up to scorn and ridicule and then we here approve their action?

It is not a question of personal assault upon Senator NyE; that is important, I concede; but I would not keep a man out of public office because in the heat of a campaign he had said something of which he afterwards repented about a Senator or about anybody else. I do not believe anyone will accuse me of having that kind of a feeling, because in the many years of my life I have been through all kinds of political contests, and I have not laid up in my heart any revengeful spirit against those who fought me, even though I believed they were unfair and unjust. But corruption has some influence upon my mind, and here is a case where a committee of the Senate, sent out to uphold the laws of Congress and of the several States, are, in a sense, assaulted by men who ought to have more sense, more wisdom, and more patriotism than to do it-assaulted for partisan political reasons. Some of us may be inclined to decide the question on personal matters and say, "If Senator NyE forgives this man, then that ought to end it." It is commendable for Senator NyE to say, "So far as anything personal is concerned, I pass it by; it does not have any effect on me "; but if we are not going to uphold our laws, and the instrumentalities which we ourselves provide to uphold them, how do we expect any respect from any of the people of the United States?

Moreover, when does this apology come? It comes too late to show good faith on the part of the man who makes it; it comes after the contest is on; it comes when he wants to be confirmed for a high office. So, even on personal grounds, it seems to me it is not entitled to very much weight.

Mr. President, there is before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate another resolution, one which I did not introduce, but it is practically a copy of the one I did introduce two years ago and which was adopted. I refer to a resolution introduced by the in my heart a jealousy in favor of those two Senators who | Senator from Iowa. It has been reported out of one committee, as I understand, and is now before the Committee | to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That resolution provides for another investigation, with the idea of upholding the same laws, with the idea of putting our elections upon a higher plane, by saying to those who would be inclined to violate election laws, "You are going to be exposed if this committee can find you out." Are we going to appoint such a committee, and if we are are we going to send them out and let the country know that everybody can assault them, that everybody can try to create a public sentiment everywhere against them, can put blocks and stones in their pathway, obstruct everything they try to do, lie to them, perjure themselves on the witness stand, and get away with it, and then have their actions approved later by the Senate? How much effect will that kind of a committee have in the effort to purify our elections and prevent men from committing crimes against the election laws?

If our election laws are not to be upheld, if crime is going to be allowed to escape unpunished when it attacks election laws in partisan controversies and contests, then why not abolish all pretense of honesty in elections? Why not put a sign up over the Vice President's chair or at the outer door and say, "Seats in this Chamber are for sale to the highest bidder; send in your bids to So-and-so"? Why not sell seats outright and turn the money over to the Government and relieve the taxpayers? If we are going to quit in our attempts to try to have Senators elected by honest, honorable, and legal methods, then throw off the cloak of pretense and sell the whole Senate to those who have got money enough to buy it, or let the candidate mortgage his official action after he gets here to the man or the corporation that is willing to put up the money to buy a seat for him.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can not allow this matter to go to a vote, especially after what has been said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] without an expression of my own feeling about it.

I do not believe that the criticism made of Senator Nyz or the Nye committee furnishes any ground whatsoever for our voting to reject the nomination. I think that the argument of the Senator from Nebraska leads directly to the conclusion that we are trying to envelop ourselves with something of the sanctity and the immunity that we give to our courts of justice. I believe that every Senator, like every other legislator and every person holding an office in the executive department of the Government, should be subject to the fullest criticism of anything he does, whether as a member of an investigating committee or any kind of a legislative committee or on the floor, or anything he does in his political or personal life; and I think that the moment we ascribe to ourselves any immunity from that criticism we are doing not only a weak thing but something that would, if it were successful, weaken the integrity of our Government.

If the statement made by this nominee was in fact libelous of Senator NyE-and I think it was-then it was for Senator NyE to decide whether he would have his action for libel, or whether he would prosecute criminally for libel, or whether he would ignore the whole business as too trivial and insignificant to matter. That is a decision that all of us have to make almost from day to day, because we are libeled, we are slandered, and so is every other public official, most of the time. Ofttimes the slander or the libel is perfect nonsense; but that is an incident of public service. For us to say that we will not confirm a man here because he has insulted or libeled or slandered one of our number in any of his public activities is wrong, Mr. President; and if I should vote against this nomination I should want it to be made very clear that that was not my reason for so voting. What bothers me is a totally different

According to the Senators from North Carolina, this nominee has spoken ill of the courts of his own State. He has denied their integrity. He has reproached them for an unwillingness to administer justice; and he has admitted that those charges were wholly unfair and unfounded, and has said that he has no evidence to sustain that attack upon the integrity of the courts. If that statement were made without warrant about the courts of my own State of Pennsylvania, I should unhesitatingly rise to my feet here and say that the nominee was wholly obnoxious to me; and I should ask the Senators, regardless of party, to deny him the confirmation of his appointment. It is not a question of party. It is a question that goes to the very integrity of the operation of our Government.

It is upon that ground, and because the Senator from North Carolina has stated that this nominee is personally obnoxious, because he has flaunted and insulted the courts of that State without warrant, without excuse, that I feel myself justified in voting against this confirmation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I only want to make a brief statement. I can see how my vote, at least, might be misunderstood.

Ever since I have been a Member of the Senate I have taken the position that the Senate was not justified in rejecting a nominee simply because some Senator said that the nominee was personally objectionable to him. I always held that when a Senator made that statement, it was his duty to tell the Senate—or, if it was a committee, to tell the committee—what his reasons were for reaching that conclusion, and let the Senate or the committee be the judge as to whether those reasons were sufficient for him to make the objection on personal grounds.

In view of what the Senator from Pennsylvania said—and I know there are a good many other Senators who do not agree with me on that, and think that when a Senator makes that statement it ought to be sufficient—for fear in the future it may be said that Senators, particularly myself, voted against Mr. Jonas because it was stated that his nomination was personally objectionable to another Senator, I want to say that while, of course, I am going to vote against his confirmation it is not on that ground.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak on this matter, though I gave considerable attention to this nomination when it was before the Judiciary Committee; but the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed] lead me to say a few words.

I agree with everything that the Senator from Pennsylvania says about the criticism of Senators. I believe that any man who takes public office must expect to be attacked and accused and abused and misrepresented almost beyond endurance, sometimes; and I, for one, would never vote against anybody because he criticized a Senator in public office, or a Congressman, or a President, or a judge. That is where I want to differ from the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The Senator from Pennsylvania thinks it is absolutely all right to attack and abuse and criticize and ridicule a man who holds public office if he be in the legislative branch of the Government, but if a man utters any attack at all upon a judge he has committed the supreme crime.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; will the Senator yield?
Mr. DILL. I yield. I understood the Senator that way, however.

Mr. REED. I said that was so only when he attacks the courts of the land admittedly without excuse, as this man now admits he was without excuse.

Mr. DILL. He admittedly attacked Senator Nye without excuse.

Mr. REED. It would not make any difference to me whether his attack had an excuse or had not.

Mr. DILL. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. REED. I think there is a distinction,

Mr. DILL. I know the Senator does. That is the point I am trying to make—that because a man holds a position in the legislative branch of the Government he must endure anything and everything, and I think he should, but if he happens to hold a judicial position, there is something divine about it, there is something sacred about it, and he is above attack. I think that is the greatest curse in the Government of this Nation.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator see any difference between a position like ours, where we can talk back, or a position like that of the President, who can talk back, and the position of a judge, who by all the ethics of his position is restrained from entering into such a controversy?

Mr. DILL. There may be a difference, but in my judgment it is not great. The thing I want to talk about is this tendency on the part of public men to throw around a man who happens to get a judicial position a reverence that he is not given if he holds any other kind of public position.

I grant that as a judge in court a man is entitled to respect, just as the Senate is entitled to the respect of the country; but when he is not on the bench, when he is off the bench, a plain citizen, he ought to be open to attack just like anybody else, and he has a right to defend himself like anybody else; and I have seen a few judges who did defend themselves like other people. For my part, I do not see any difference because a man is an official in the judicial department of the Government or because he is in the legislative branch of the Government; and my criticism of Mr. Jonas, and my objection to him, are not that he attacked Senator Nye unjustly. They are not that he attacked some judge somewhere unjustly. They are that these attacks, made as they have been made repeatedly on different public officials, show that he is a man who is not self-controlled, show that he is not temperate, show that he is reckless and can not be relied upon to use the tact and judgment that a man in the position he has been appointed to fill ought to possess. They show that he is not qualified to hold a position with the power that a United States attorney holds; and, unlike the Senator from Nebraska, I attach a great deal of weight to the fact that the Senators from Mr. Jonas's State look upon him as personally objectionable. I believe that that is an objection that ought to have great weight with Senators, and it does have great weight with me.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to get the idea that I think such a thing is not entitled to weight. Perhaps what I said would convey that idea, but I do not want it to do so. What I mean to say is that when an objection is made that a nominee is personally objectionable, standing alone, I would not vote against his confirmation unless the reasons for the matter were given, and they appealed to me as being sufficient.

Mr. DILL. I can conceive, I think, of a case where that might be true; but I hardly think a Member of this body would declare a man personally objectionable to him without having good reasons—and by "good reasons" I mean reasons that would justify any fair-minded man in considering him personally objectionable.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate, but I did want to express that viewpoint, because I believe the greatest thing that can be done for the courts of America is for the judges of those courts to be made to realize that they are the servants of the people; that they hold public office just as much in the judicial department as do the men in the executive and the legislative departments; and I do not believe an attack upon the integrity of a court is any worse than an attack upon the integrity of the Presidency or of the Senate or of the House of Representatives. The difference is that the court can protect itself by contempt proceedings. They are all coordinate branches of the Government. The court has its own power to protect itself when there is a case under consideration, and that is all that is necessary. I refuse to sit silent and hear men who are in elective offices of the legislative branch of the Government treated as if nothing can injure or hurt them and men who happen to be in the judicial branch of the Government elevated to that divine place that no word of criticism may be mentioned against them without committing lèse-majesté.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything on this question; but in view of what has been suggested by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] I feel called upon to make myself heard on one or two points at least.

I am just as much interested as is the Senator from Nebraska in clean and honest elections, in having Members represent the various States in the most creditable manner, and in having them come here with credentials against which there can be no complaint. I have a record on that subject, Mr. President. I did not hesitate to vote to reject Smith, of Illinois, and Vare, of Pennsylvania, when those contests were before the Senate.

We may have a similar contest in North Carolina. Every Member of this body knows that there were charges of widespread fraud in that State. When that question comes before this body, if it does, if there be evidence to support the charges that are made, I shall not hesitate again to vote for the rejection of anyone in this body who might have been a beneficiary of those widespread frauds.

I think this nominee for this official position was sincerely interested in that question. The junior Senator from North Carolina himself has been interested in that question for years past, according to all the information that has come to me. He himself has made charges, much more serious against the election laws of North Carolina, I am informed, than any attempted or suggested by this nominee for the office of United States attorney.

This man, if he becomes United States attorney, will be the prosecuting attorney for the Federal Government in that Commonwealth. He ought not to be intimidated. He ought to speak his mind freely. He ought to be given credit for criticizing bad election laws; and if he is sincere in it, he ought to be given credit for criticizing a Member of this body, if he really believes that Member has not done his duty in uncovering election frauds.

I know the shoulders of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye] are broad. He will not object to such criticism, whether it is right or wrong, if he believes it was sincerely made. So I think it comes to be largely a political question, from all the evidence I have been able to get.

While I was not a member of any subcommittee investigating this nominee's qualifications, I did attend meetings of the Committee on the Judiciary and became impressed with this salient fact, that Mr. Jonas is honorable, capable, clean, and that he has made an excellent record, up to this time, in the office he holds at present. So it seems to me there is no reason why he should be rejected, unless it be on political grounds.

I can not follow the logic of the Senator from Nebraska, who has my very great admiration, when he attempts to link this with the question of corruption in senatorial elections. It was exactly out of that situation that this controversy arose. What Mr. Jonas has undertaken to do has been to point out glaring defects in the election and perhaps in the machinery which has been provided for holding elections in North Carolina. Is that any reason why he should be rejected for the office of United States attorney, when we understand that if he is finally confirmed in that office it will be his duty then always to keep his eye and his ear wide open to see whether there be any corruption anywhere along the line?

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

I should think that would be an added qualification for the post to which Mr. Jonas has been nominated. When that question comes to this floor, if it does, we will know more about these alleged irregularities in North Carolina. The Members of this body may have an opportunity to weigh the evidence and then to vote; and if the evidence is as I have been given to understand it may be, it will be interesting to see Senators on the other side of the Chamwhen similar questions have been before this body.

Mr. President, while I go as far as does the Senator from Nebraska in insisting that senatorial elections be held far above corruption and that they be honestly conducted, I do not follow his logic in this situation at all, because that is what Jonas stands for, and all of his trouble at the present moment has grown out of his insistence in that

Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRISON. The Senator has moved so far from what he was talking about when I desired to ask him a question that I believe I will delay and answer him when he gets through, instead of asking him a question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am perfectly willing to answer any question the Senator may have to propound, if it is within my power to do so.

Mr. MORRISON. Does the Senator believe Mr. Jonas was doing anything to promote fair elections by denouncing the committee a month before the election took place and charging it with whitewashing the election the Senator is talking about because the committee had displeased him in the manner in which they had investigated a primary

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, perhaps the committee did not investigate aright; perhaps there was some ground for the criticism. We will pass on that question, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, when the time comes. The Senator will have an opportunity, I apprehend, to pass on that question and to vote, himself, with reference to the election down there. Then we shall be able to see, perhaps, whether there was any justification in the criticism leveled against the committee. But the point I make is, whether or not he was justified in that criticism. he had a right to make it if he was sincere in making it, and I honor him for having done so. It takes courage, and especially down there, to stand up and be willing to criticize in a matter of this kind, and particularly when the man making the criticism occupies the prominent place in his party this man does occupy.

Mr. President, I think the whole question as to the justification of this criticism can be left in abeyance. The Senate is in no position yet to judge. When the evidence is laid before the Senate, as I hope it will be, then, indeed, we can vote on that question; but in the meantime I am certain the Senator from North Dakota is perfectly able, and, for that matter, willing, to absorb any criticism that may come his way. He, like most of the rest of us, has been compelled to accept a great deal of criticism, and I suppose we will continue to be criticized as long as we are in public life.

I may say, in passing, that some of us have been criticized even on the floor of the Senate in far more severe terms than were suggested by this nominee for this particular place.

Finally, in my opinion, this man is eminently qualified for the place to which he has been named by the President. He is honorable, upright, straightforward, and able. Therefore, he ought to be confirmed.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, in many respects, whether in our individual and personal or in our official capacities, we are creatures of habit. I have followed certain rules since I came to the Senate; and, while consistency may be for small minds, nevertheless, I am open to the charge of at least attempting to be consistent during my career in the Senate. I have always believed that when a man came properly accredited from his State with a commission as a Senator elect, duly signed by his governor, it was the duty of the Senate to admit him. I argued in the Vare case and in the Smith case that that was the duty of the Senate. When the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] came here duly accredited, I was one of those who said in the Republican conference that I expected to vote to admit him, notwithstanding charges that had been made.

Likewise, when I came here I adopted the policy of voting against the confirmation of any man appointed to a Federal position if and when a Senator from the State in which he ber vote in accordance with views expressed in the past | lived rose in his place on the floor of the Senate and stated that the appointment was personally obnoxious and personally offensive to him. Originally that rule was followed without regard to the field of activity of the appointee; that is to say, if a man were appointed to office anywhere and a Senator rose to say the appointment was personally offensive, it was regarded as sufficient to cause rejection. But about 10 years ago there was a modification of the rule here, and I was one of those who led the fight to bring about the modification.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly. Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to say there is a rule on that subject in the Senate?

Mr. WATSON. No; I do not mean to say there is a rule; but there is a practice; if the Senator please, an unwritten

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; very well.
Mr. WATSON. It is a practice or custom that has been followed; so that where a man is appointed to serve wholly within the State represented by the Senator who makes the objection, in such a case his objection on such grounds is sufficient reason for rejection.

I believe that the nominee in the present case is perfectly competent; I believe he is an honest man; I believe the President was fully justified in making the appointment; but, because of the fact that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley], in his capacity as a Senator, standing in his place in the Senate of the United States, clothed with all the solemn obligations that should surround a Senator, has made the statement that this appointment is personally obnoxious and personally offensive to him, following my consistent rule and believing it to be the proper one, I can not vote for his confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is. Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the Senate refuses to advise and consent to the nomination. The clerk will state the next order of business on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Mr. COPELAND. I ask that Calendar No. 3217, the nomination of Charles A. Sandburg, to be postmaster at Jamestown, N. Y., may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be

Mr. ODDIE. In behalf of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Bulkley] I ask that Calendar No. 3238, the nomination of Frank L. Lee to be postmaster at Campbell, Ohio, be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over, and, without objection, the other nominations of postmasters on the calendar will be confirmed en bloc.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 24, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REJECTION

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate March 23, 1932

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the revelation of eternal love, may we seek constantly to be filled with Thy spirit, using our position, our influence, and our knowledge to soften the sorrows and lighten the burdens of our people. Thus we shall hasten society on to the better days. Thou Christ, with whom everlasting truth doth prevail, unto whom the winds were obedient as Thy holy feet pressed the turbulent surface of the darkened waters, do Thou ripen our judgment and bring us into the clearest and fullest light of Thy wisdom. So direct us that Thou canst give solemn and tremendous sanction to our conclusions. Make our associations helpful; lift them to a plane of brotherly fellowship and cooperation. Merciful God, we pray that the call of our Nation may be our creed and allow nothing whatsoever to lull the needs of the land into the shades of neglect or defeat. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 3282. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from the Rincon Hill district in San Francisco by way of Goat Island to Oakland; and

S. 3409. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the Record a letter received from the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object, Mr. Speaker.

HON. GILBERT N. HAUGEN

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that we have with us a man who, to-day, completes 33 years and 20 days of continuous service in the House of Representatives.

If I mistake not, this is the longest period of continuous service that any person has ever been privileged to serve in this House. I refer to that grandest old Roman of them all, everybody's friend, GILBERT N. HAUGEN, of Iowa. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. Speaker, may I add that during all these years Mr. Haugen has always stood foursquare to every political wind that has blown. He has not only rendered able, honest, and efficient service to his district but he has rendered patriotic service to his Government. I know I speak the voice of both his Republican and Democratic colleagues when I extend to him our heartiest congratulations on his long and useful service. I want the people of his district and the State of Iowa to know that he has the affection and respect of all his colleagues here in the House, and we hope his life may be spared for another 33 years and that he may be with us and continue his efficient and useful service here. [Applause.]

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a newspaper published in the city of Chicago known as the Chicago Daily Tribune on Monday, March 21, 1932, made this libelous and willfully malicious statement concerning me as a Member of this LaGuardia, who is alien in mind and spirit from Americanism, who has no loyalty to our form of Government, and shows every indication that he is willing to destroy it.

On this I ask recognition, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has clearly stated a question of personal privilege. The Chair has looked up the precedents and there are a number of instances not as strong as the one here presented which were held by Mr. Speaker Clark and Mr. Speaker Longworth to be questions of personal privilege.

The gentleman from New York is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, there are only two things that a poor man has in this country. They are his honor and his love and loyalty to his country. [Applause.]

It is certainly stooping pretty low when a newspaper, because of difference of opinion, honest difference of opinion, will make such a cowardly attack on a Member of the House.

The writer of this article no doubt wrote it under instructions, and the purpose is manifest. The Chicago Tribune, apparently, disagrees with my views on maintaining a policy of taxation which this Congress has adopted of a progressive, graduated tax on incomes and disagrees with me in my efforts to prevent any system of taxation which will put a greater burden on the great masses of the American people in order to relieve a favored, privileged minority. They have a right to differ. They have no right to impugn my Americanism or attack my loyalty to my Gentlemen, I believe in the freedom of the press. I believe in free speech. I have gone the limit in my official life to defend these institutions. I am often, and naturally, attacked and criticized and very often misrepresented because of the active attitude I take on many issues in this House. I do not complain. I realize it is part of our public life, but I do resent, and I protest an attack of this kind, inspired to create passion and prejudice and animosity in order to becloud the real issue, that of taxation, before the House.

I am sure there is not a man on the floor of this House who happens to disagree with me or who has taken a different attitude from me on this tax question who would not resent an attack of this kind. [Applause.] Has this newspaper no arguments to present to support their contention, whatever it may be? Is it necessary to jeopardize the standing of a Member on the floor of the House by such an unjustifiable attack? The writer of that article must have known the charge was false when he wrote it.

This paper owns a newspaper in my city, under different management, but it is owned by the same interest. That paper criticized me editorially Sunday. It misrepresented me to a certain extent, but the editorial, the attack or the criticism, was within bounds. It was entirely proper from their viewpoint. I did not like the editorial, it was hardly fair. I have no criticism to make of that. It is part of the game. In the case of the Chicago Tribune, it is apparent they could find nothing else, except perhaps the two vowels in the ending of my name, and they hit on the idea expressed in the article-made this cowardly attack.

Gentlemen, there are certain things that even a Member of Congress can not submit to, and this is one of them. I am not going to take the time of the House to-day, because of the calendar situation. I am not going at this time into the reasons for my attitude on the tax bill, because to do that now would not be proper. I will defend my position on that in the course of the consideration of the bill. I do want to say to Mr. Chicago Tribune that I will compare my standing in my community with the standing of the alleged influential Chicago Tribune in the city of Chicago. [Ap-

THE SALES TAX

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a speech that I made over the radio last night on taxation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address over the Dixie network of the Columbia Broadcasting System by myself on the sales-tax feature of the current revenue bill:

revenue bill:

I have been invited to talk to you to-night about the sales-tax proposal contained in the pending revenue bill now under consideration by the House of Representatives. It is probably unnecessary for me to say that I am now, and have been, against the sales tax during my entire public career."

The first and chief reason why I oppose the sales tax is that it is contrary to or sins against every sound principle of taxation; it is a tax on consumption, a tax on what we spend for the necessaries of life, it is a tax imposed without any regard or consideration whatever for the principle of ability to pay. One of the chief reasons I have always been a Democrat is because of the traditional theory of that party that taxes should be levied in accordance with this principle.

So far as I am informed, no Democratic convention, either State or National, has ever declared in its platform for a sales tax. The last Democratic convention speaking on this subject was that in 1924, which said:

in 1924, which said:
"We oppose the so-called nuisance taxes, sales taxes, and all other forms of taxation that unfairly shift to the consumer the burdens of taxation."
Upon that declaration I stood then, I stand now, and shall always stand.

always stand.

But opposition to the sales tax is not confined to Demecrats. It has been opposed by many able and patriotic Republicans, as well as most of the great economists of the present and the past. John Sherman, a great Senator from Ohio and Republican Secretary of the Treasury, declared a sales tax to be not only the most oppressive but the most indefensible form of taxation.

Prof. E. R. A. Seligman, professor of political economy at Columbia University, one of the most noted economists of the day, declared that a sales tax is violative of every sound principle of taxation.

taxation.

John Stuart Mill, in his noted work, Principles of Political Economy, said on taxation:
"The subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support

Economy, said on taxation:

"The subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support of the government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities to pay."

That has been the Democratic Party's theory of taxation from the time it was founded by Thomas Jefferson; it was in harmony with that principle that the Democratic Party took the lead in and finally succeeded in having the Federal Constitution amended so that an income tax might be levied. It is no longer disputed, unless it be by some one who is not sufficiently patriotic to be willing to carry his share of the expenses of government, that the income tax is the fairest, soundest, and most equitable form of taxation developed in the history of government. A sales tax is in contravention of every principle of the income tax.

Economists estimate that 13 per cent of the people of the United States own 90 per cent of the total wealth of the country. Under the theory of taxation, according to ability to pay, these 13 per cent of the people should pay 90 per cent of the taxes. But under a sales tax the reverse would be the case, for basing the tax exclusively on consumption, as a sales tax would do, these 13 per cent of the people who own 90 per cent of the total wealth would pay only 13 per cent of the tax, while the 87 per cent of the people who represent 87 per cent of the consuming power of the total population would pay 87 per cent of the tax, although they only owned 10 per cent of the total wealth of the Nation.

The sales tax now under consideration by Congress is in almost its worst form, as it exempts only a portion of the food we con-

The sales tax now under consideration by Congress is in almost its worst form, as it exempts only a portion of the food we consume and levies a tax on everything else incident to life from its beginning to its close. It is also a tax on education, upon transportation, upon the arts and sciences, upon amusements and Take the case of the average man, with an average family and a modest salary, say, of $2,000 per year. Of course, substantially everything he earns goes for the necessaries of life, and frequently that salary is insufficient to meet what appears to be requirements incident to the support and upkeep of his family—for education, medical expenses, and so forth. Under the sales tax he would pay on his entire income.

Set opposite this the case of a man with an income of a million dollars a year—and there are many such men even in these times of depression and want. He does not spend even a large fraction of his income for the necessities of life, but let us be liberal about it and say he spends $100,000 a year; he would spend one-tenth of his income, and under the sales-tax plan would pay taxes on one-tenth of his income. May I ask which can best afford to contribute to the support of this Government? tan best afford to contribute to the support of this Government? The man who spends all of his $2,000, and that in the most frugal way, or the man with an income of a million dollars who would pay a tax on but one-tenth of his income and possibly invest the believe in tax or any acquirities?

frugal way, or the man with an income of a would pay a tax on but one-tenth of his income and possibly invest the balance in tax-exempt securities?

I submit that in these terribly hard times, when banks are failing by the hundreds and mortgages being foreclosed by the thousands, when eight or ten million are out of employment and can not get enough money with which to buy bread, when homes are being sold for taxes, this is no time to increase the suffering and misery of our people by heaping additional tax burdens upon the poor and middle classes.

Most of those who are now advocating the adoption of the sales

Most of those who are now advocating the adoption of the sales tax apologize for it and justify their action by saying we are facing an emergency that makes this additional tax necessary in order to preserve the credit of the Federal Government. I contend, however, that the facts do not warrant this conclusion, though I maintain that the Government's credit must be protected and preserved. The first step, however, in this direction, and the first thing that should be done toward balancing the Federal Budget is to cut Federal expenditures drastically.

The Democratic-controlled Appropriations Committee House has made a splendid record in this direction. W noise has made a splendid record in this direction. With four major appropriation bills yet to be reported out, it has reduced appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 under those of 1932 by nearly $500,000,000, and appropriation bills yet to be acted upon will increase this figure, I am confident, to more than a half billion dollars. Not only that, the committee has already cut appropriations under the Budget recommendations of the President for 1933 by $115,000,000, and will increase this cut to not less than $150,000,000. But we have just started. Other economies should and will be effected. With four should and will be effected.

When we add to these savings the additional sums that can be obtained through higher income-tax rates in the upper brackets, obtained through higher income-tax rates in the upper brackets, affecting those with incomes of $100,000 or more per year, and when we increase the inheritance-tax rate and impose a gift tax, we will be pretty close to the goal of a balanced Budget—so near that I have small doubt that with needed stop-gaps in the Treasury Department to prevent tax evasions, and with some justifiable nonburdensome luxury taxes, we will be able to balance the Budget of the Federal Government in a reasonable time, and do it without the necessity of imposing a sales tax which, to my mind, can only be justified in a period of very great national stress, as, for instance, in times of war.

Not even in the grave emergency of the late World War, when we wrote a war revenue bill under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, of William G. McAdoo, and the two great North Carolina legislators, Senator F. M. Simmons, and Claude Kitchin, did the situation become so serious that it became necessary to levy a general sales tax. Surely we have not arrived at so grave an emergency now.

We hear it said that unless the proposed sales tax is imposed in order to balance the Budget, the Government's credit will be seriously impaired, and that prices of bonds will fall to ruinous levels. I do not believe this is true, but rather that this is a threat from the great moneyed interests made in the effort to thrust the burthe great moneyed interests made in the effort to thrust the burden of taxation on the shoulders of those who are least able to pay in order to relieve those who are most able to pay.

If in this emergency wealth does not shoulder its share of the burden, then what has become of the patriotism of the wealthy class? Compare it with the noble and sacrificing patriotism of the millions of men who rallied to the defense of the Government in the late war, thousands of them giving even their lives as a sacrifice on their country's altar. Surely in this emergency wealth ought to offer itself now as the youth of our land did in that other period of sacrifice.

Moreover, it is within the power of the Government, without Moreover, it is within the power of the Government, without the imposition of any additional taxes, to get enough money already owing to it to go a long way toward balancing the Budget. In December, responding to an inquiry made by Representative McFadden, of Pennsylvania, Secretary Mellon advised that tax cases involving $917,000,000 owing to the Government were tied up in cases before the Treasury Department. A little expedition in settling these cases would bring into the Treasury in a relatively short time some $300,000,000 more money than is estimated to be raised by the pending sales-tax proposal.

mated to be raised by the pending sales-tax proposal.

Furthermore, I invite attention to the fact that in the last 10 years the Treasury Department has allowed in cash tax refunds, credits, and abatements more than $3,500,000,000. Nobody believes that all of this money was erroneously collected or ought to have been all paid back, because about 80 per cent of it was collected more than a decade ago in war taxes to pay the cost of winning the were

If the Treasury Department were not so generous in granting these huge tax refunds, we would not have these gaping holes in the Treasury which are being used to-day in an effort to frighten Congress into burdening the American people with a sales tax, which, I repeat, is an unjust and most burdensome tax, resting most heavily on those least able to pay it.

most heavily on those least able to pay it.

When we have collected the money rightly owing to the Government, when the Treasury Department quits giving back billions in refunds, and when we exhaust the resources to be reached by the income and inheritance taxes and by luxury taxes, and when we have cut out all unnecessary expenditures and applied the most rigid and drastic economy compatible with efficient Government, then will be the time to again consider the state of the Union and determine what further revision of our revenue system may be required. system may be required.

The committee having this bill in charge, seeing certain defeat of the sales-tax provision, have offered some amendments in their desperate effort to prevent defeat; however, the vicious principle remains, also many of its burdensome features; hence it should and, I believe, will be defeated.

VIRGINIA

Mr. FISHBURNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISHBURNE. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, I desire to read to this House a recent editorial written by a distinguished author and orator, Claude G. Bowers, entitled Virginia Shrines."

VIRGINIA SHRINES By Claude G. Bowers

With the Washington celebration in full blast, and many with the Washington celebration in full blast, and many Americans planning a sentimental and patriotic journey into Virginia, we make this suggestion for which we will be thanked. No motorist planning his journey should fail to include Charlottesville, for not only is there charm to that ancient southern town and hospitality and the best possible hotel accommodations, but there, too, are shrines at which all Americans should bow. These shrines are associated with the intimate friends of Washington-men who with him, helped to make America and Americanism

First of all is that incomparably beautiful home of Thomas Jefferson on the hilltop, Monticello, visited for a century and a half, not only because it was the home of the author of the Declaration of Independence and the philosopher of American Democracy, but because it is an architectural gem.

Down in the valley, and within sight of the home of Jefferson, the tourist may visit Ashlawn, the home of James Monroe, father of the Monroe doctrine. Jefferson designed the house to fit the financial means of his disciple, and Monroe chose the site so he could see the lights in his idol's mansion from his own window. A fine statue of Monroe soon will be unveiled there on the lawn.

The boxwood there is worth going hundreds of miles to see. And within easy distance of Charlottesville the motorist, on a sentimental journey, will want to see Montpelier, the stately home of James Madison, "Father of the Constitution." An ideal patriotic pilgrimage, this, to the homes and haunts of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe.

Mr. Speaker, Virginians are justly proud of the many great men whose names have adorned the history of their State, and they are proud of the fact that the attention of the Nation is being called back to Virginia's shrines.

I shall undertake to make a statement before this House, which represents all the States of the Union, that I have made heretofore for Virginia consumption, a statement I believe historically true, and I ask you to weigh what I say. Three great Virginians did more toward the formation of this Government than any others in this Republic: George Washington made our Government possible; Thomas Jefferson made it popular; and John Marshall made it permanent.

The thirteen Colonies declared their independence of Great Britain in terms of the Declaration of Independence; they gained their independence under the military leadership of George Washington; they established the Government in a convention presided over by George Washington; and the first President of the Republic so established was George Washington, the one person in the new Republic whose transcendent fitness was unanimously recognized.

After George Washington the trend of the Government, however, was inclined toward monarchy, which was much feared by the body of the people; such fears were dissipated when Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence and the Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, identified with the great principles of Democracy, became the leader of the people, and restored confidence in the purposes of the new Government.

The followers of the republican ideals of Jefferson in their buoyancy and enthusiasm may well have threatened the stability of the Government had not John Marshall, jurist and statesman, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States of America, by his decisions stabilized the young government and created in that court a balance wheel for the new Republic.

I have the honor of representing the district in Virginia in which Charlottesville and Albemarle County are located. I was born and reared in the county of Albemarle under the very shadow of Monticello, the little mountain, where Thomas Jefferson, the patron saint of Democracy, had his home, and I am an alumnus of the University of Virginia, established by him. I am prouder still of being a member of the party founded by Thomas Jefferson, which alone of all American parties can boast an unbroken historic continuity for more than 100 years, and which will continue to exist in undiminished vigor as long as there is a response in the hearts of our people to the doctrines taught by Thomas Jefferson, whose own great heart was attuned to the "still sad music of humanity."

It has been said of Jefferson that he was-

A wise philosopher, a consummate diplomat, a prescient states-A wise philosopher, a consummate diplomat, a prescient statesman, a daring crusader for liberty and toleration; he was one of the most accomplished gentlemen of his age. Artist, musician, architect, landscape gardener, lover of painting and sculpture, and a graceful writer; no other American statesman has approached him in versatility of talent. His artistic spirit lives in the exquisite beauty of Monticello and in the stately lines of the University of Virginia. His love of liberty and equal rights is written into the laws. His wisdom lives in his published letters and public papers, and his monument is the Republic of the fathers.

I want to recall to this House that the greatest orator, writer, and statesman of modern time, Woodrow Wilson, was an alumnus of Jefferson's university, and it is a striking reflection that the beau ideal of Woodrow Wilson was to make the world safe for Jeffersonian Democracy. [Applause.]

This is a Democratic year, and the Democrats have control of this House. Since I have been in this distinguished body, I have been voting with my Democratic brethren for measures which have originated in the opposition party, from a patriotic feeling that perhaps such measures might, to some extent, relieve the distress caused by the extravagance and misrule of Republican administrations. We have gone far, and I believe there are others beside myself who feel that perhaps we have gone too far, and we do not enjoy the unctuous commendations of a party that welcomes our efforts in behalf of measures introduced by them but treat with distrust and disdain measures which the Democratic Party advances.

In my humble judgment, the greatest question before the American people and the issue, if properly met, which will do most to benefit this country is the proper adjustment of the tariff. The day of infant industries has passed, our industries are no longer infants but lusty adults, and this Nation has become the great creditor nation of the world.

We have been supporting loyally measures originating in the White House. Is it too much to ask from the White House and the Republicans in Congress their loyal and generous support of a bill introduced in this House which asks for a reduction in the tariff walls and is designed to place this great creditor nation in the enviable position of being the great clearing house of the world? I say that we Democrats are beginning to feel that the doctrine of reciprocity is at least being neglected when we are asked to support Republican measures, and do support them, but Democratic measures are treated with disdain and contempt.

We are beginning to be suspicious of the candor of our Republican friends and feel like old Isaac of old when he exclaimed: "The voice is Jacob's, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

We are on the eve of a great election, and it may not be inappropriate to refer to the fact that Virginians may present to the country as a presidential candidate a man that the great writer and orator, whose editorial I have read you, described in a recent interview as follows:

What Harry Byrd needs more than anything else is a campaign of nation-wide publicity to acquaint the country with his truly extraordinary record as Governor of Virginia. The country as a whole is not aware of that record to the extent that it should be. Harry Byrd is a man whose record, when properly publicized, would seize the imagination of the American people. He is one of the commanding figures in the Democratic Party, and he will certainly be elected if he is nominated.

Is it not possible that the hosts of Democracy may in this year of our Lord march to victory led by a Virginian, and the battle song of the marching millions be the inspiring song so beautifully rendered recently by our distinguished colleague, Carry Me Back to Old Virginny? [Applause.]

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees, and when the Committee on the Public Lands was reached:

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands, I call up the bill H. R. 8087, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to vacate withdrawals of public lands under the reclamation law, with reservation of rights, ways, and easements.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms directed to notify absent Members, and the Clerk called the roll. The following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 8087.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I have been seeking recognition to ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana has the floor and is in charge of the bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am asking the gentleman from Montana if he will permit me to speak out of order for

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to speak 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina vield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I did not object to this request, but I serve notice now on the House that to any further requests during the day I shall object. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Committee on Public Lands has the call. We will be called only once during the session. We have some important bills. One or two of the bills are controverted. It is very evident that it is the disposition of the House not to allow those controverted bills to go through. I hope we may proceed to take up matters about which there is no controversy and have them passed. Under these circumstances I shall object to any further unanimous-consent requests.

THE SALES TAX

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will give me its respectful attention, because I am trying to perform what I believe is a real service to the country. I may not measure up to that. I dislike very much to appear in the position of a revolter against the regular Democratic organization, and I am not a revolter but only doing my duty as I see it. I have great respect and admiration and love and affection for the leadership of this House. That includes the Speaker, who I think is one of the greatest Americans in the country. That includes the very distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the majority leader, Mr. RAINEY, whom I love as I do my own father. [Laughter.] Do not laugh at that. My father is dead. When I speak the word "father" I speak it with a very great deal of reverence and respect. I would not let a man in this House harm a hair of HENRY RAINEY'S head, and any man who undertakes to do that will have to answer to me for it. I do not want any more levity, because I am going to make you a serious speech, and when I get through I am going to tell you something I think this House ought to be told, and that applies to the membership and the leadership. Take this man called CHARLEY CRISP. I have not a better friend in the United States than CHARLEY CRISP. If it had not been for Jack Garner, Charley Crisp, Henry T. Rainey, BOB DOUGHTON, and other Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, the ambition of my life would not have been realized and I would not have been placed on the greatest committee in this House, the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Is this speech in answer to the one that the gentleman from North Carolina made vesterday?

Mr. ABERNETHY. No. I have not consulted with any of the leadership of this House. I think if I had followed their dictation and the dictation of my own delegation, I would not have made this speech, but I have been here long enough and have seen enough trouble in my lifetime to know a few things about humanity. I came up as the son of a Methodist preacher. I have seen the day when I was hungry. Now, will you all give me your attention, for I am going to speak until you do.

A MEMBER. Your time is running.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not care whether it runs or not and I do not care whether they give me any more time or not. If you do not want to hear this speech, all right. have been here 10 years and I never have but in a few instances made a speech over 15 minutes until the other day, and I made one for an hour, and it has not been printed, and I doubt whether it ever will be printed. I owe this House this speech, I owe this leadership this speech, I owe the country this speech. I walked out of this House yesterday-and I want the attention of the press gallery up there and I want you boys to print this all over the country. There is one man sitting up in the press gallery whom I entertained down in the basement of this House, and he ate a whole barrel of my oysters; and yesterday, if he had not been afraid of it, he would have called me a fool for being against the sales tax, and maybe I am one. Now, print that, will you? I dare you to do it. And I am going to have some more oysters here in about 15 days, and you all come and eat your bellies full, and then print that.

I am eternally, everlastingly, world without end, against the sales tax. I went to Canada and studied it, and I came to the conclusion that it did not fit in under our form of government.

Now I am going to tell you something about Bos Doughton, and he is going to object to it, and he is trembling in his shoes right now. He is going to say, "I wish you had not made that speech," but I will make it if you give me the time, and if you do not, I am going to continue to get time and make it. There is one Member of Congress—I wish he were here to-day—who has been here one term, who objected to my continuing my speech yesterday. He objected. If I wanted to be mean about it, he would never get an appropriation through the Appropriations Committee, but I am not mean.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLFENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

VACATING WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC LANDS UNDER THE RECLAMATION LAW

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8087) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to vacate withdrawals of public lands under the reclamation law, with reservation of rights, ways, and easements.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and under the rules the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8087, with Mr. Parker of Georgia in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where public lands of the United States have been withdrawn for possible use for construction purposes under the Federal reclamation laws, and are known or believed to be valuable for minerals and would, if not so withdrawn, be subject to location and patent under the general mining laws, the Secretary of the Interior, when in his opinion the rights of the United States will not be prejudiced thereby, may, in his discretion, vacate such withdrawal, reserving such ways, rights, and easements over or to such lands as may be prescribed by him and as may be deemed necessary or appropriate, including the right to take and remove from such lands construction materials for use in the construction of irrigation works, and/or the said Secretary may require the execution of a contract by the intending locator or entryman as a condition precedent to the vesting of any rights in him, when in the opinion of the Secretary same may be necessary for the protection of the irrigation interests. Such reservations or contract rights may be in favor of the United States or irrigation concerns cooperating or contracting with the United States and operating in the vicinity of such lands. The Secretary may prescribe the form of such contract to be executed and acknowledged and recorded by any locator or entryman of such land before any rights in their favor attach thereto, and the locator or entryman executing such contract shall undertake such indemnifying covenants and shall grant such rights over such lands as in the opinion of the Secretary may be necessary for the protection of Federal or private irrigation in the vicinity. Notice of such reservation or of the necessity of executing such prescribed contract shall be filed in the General Land Office and in the appropriate local land office, and notations thereof shall be made upon the appropriate tract books, and any location or entry thereafter made upon or for such lands, and any patent therefor shall be subject to the terms of such contract and/or to s

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior may prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to enable him to enforce the provisions of this act.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, this bill permits the Secretary of the Interior to vacate withdrawals of lands withdrawn for reclamation purposes to a limited extent.

It has developed that when these reclamation projects started large tracts of land contiguous to the development were withdrawn from any sort of entry. The Secretary of the Interior informs the Public Lands Committee that in instances more land has been withdrawn than was actually necessary and that mineral has been discovered upon some of those lands. The Secretary is not willing that there be absolute vacation of any of those tracts, because we might need them in the future. He has now asked for this enactment, that a limited patent may be granted to people to make certain locations upon those lands, the Government reserving the right of easement over the lands and the right to use any necessary material, such as gravel or sand or stone or any other material in the lands that are granted in this limited patent to mineral claimants.

As far as I know, there are no such cases in my State. The bill does not come from me, although I introduced it. I introduced it at the instance of the Secretary of the Interior, who informs me that instances of that kind have arisen and that it would be an accommodation to the Interior Department in handling the matter if a limited patent could be granted to these people, the Secretary providing what the contract shall be and the party in effect giving a bond to comply with it, the Government reserving everything that it needs in the lands and the right to go upon and take it when it so desires.

I do not know of any opposition.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the operation of this measure, if enacted, entail any special costs?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. None whatever. It would be some source of revenue to the Government and to the individual, but no outlay from the Treasury.

Mr. THATCHER. Does the operation have any effect of subtracting from the assets of the Government in the ownership of the lands?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think not. I think indeed it would enhance the value of the lands if somebody was making profitable use of them on a reclamation project.

Mr. THATCHER. Discretionary power is given to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. He absolutely has control of it. He says what shall be granted and what shall not be granted. There can be no withdrawal unless it is all vacated. By this bill we are permitting partial, limited vacation.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is this land a part of reclamation projects?
Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; in a way it is. It is land belonging to the Government of the United States that has been withdrawn from entry because of a reclamation project being constructed in the vicinity of it. It is public land.

Mr. TABER. But is it land that is benefited by an irrigation project?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I would not say the land is benefited, but in the judgment of the Secretary it was thought necessary to withdraw it from entry because they were going to construct a project; and from time to time it has been ascertained that if they did not withdraw enough land there would be some trouble by somebody making entries, and so we have withdrawn large tracts of land, oftentimes more than was needed. Now we are trying to vacate it in part.

Mr. TABER. Is it not land that, as a result of its withdrawal, was supposed to have been benefited by the reclamation project?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Not at all.

Mr. TABER. And which now somebody can get a little cheaper without paying the cost of the reclamation project?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think the gentleman is certainly in error. It does not provide for the vacation of any agricultural land, but it provides that a man may come in and mine minerals found on that land and discovered after the withdrawal by the Government was made.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I happen to know of an instance where land was withdrawn for irrigation purposes, a large tract, and part of this tract, upon closer examination, proved to be standing at an angle of from 45 to 75 degrees, a bluff to a stream, wholly unsuited to irrigation under any and all conditions. This particular tract of land afterwards was desired for the development of a mineral spring, and, as I understand, this bill would take care of cases of that kind and that have nothing to do with irrigation, never can have, but in blocking a large area they included some land of this kind.

Mr. TABER. It would seem to me that if we open up a lot more land to entry at this time, we are doing something that is economically unsound; that there is no demand, either for the development of the mineral resources or anything else, at this time, that would justify us in reopening a lot of land of any kind for reentry. It seems as though it would make conditions worse rather than better. I would like to hear what the gentleman has to say about that.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I will make this statement: I am not in accord with the gentleman's views that it is economically unsound. I think it is economically sound, if there is some land withdrawn from entry, to vacate that to the extent that it might be put to some economic use, some beneficial use.

This land is lying idle. It is not needed for the reclamation project. However, at some time the Government may want to go there and take off the gravel, take off the sand, or run a tramway across the land.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. This bill simply extends the mining laws to these lands?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. That is the effect of it; yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from New York that when the Boulder Dam project was contemplated, there was a great area of land withdrawn. Of this land I dare say there was not an acre that was susceptible of irrigation. It was withdrawn in order to protect the works. We did not know how far away from the dam site gravel was located. We did not know how far away we would have to exclude settlers for the purpose above stated as well as to isolate the area to prevent in a way conflicting interests. So hundreds of square miles were withdrawn. In this area of hundreds of square miles there are deposits of potash, borax, gold, silver, copper, lead, gravel, and building stone. There is no way in the world by which a man can go on that land now and locate a claim, locate a quarry, or locate a gravel pit unless such legislation as this is enacted into law. It is not reclamation land per se, because under the term "reclamation land" we assume the land is level enough so that it can be made perfectly level for irrigation and that it is close enough to water so that water can be put on it, but this land is not of that type. It is desert land, rough mountain land, but it is of some use for gravel and for mining purposes. That is the purpose of this bill; its purpose is not directed toward the Boulder Dam project, but it could be applied there to good advantage even after the gentleman from Nevada has succeeded in decreasing the reserved area at Boulder to a much smaller area than now exists.

Mr. TABER. Is there any reasonable demand for that type of land at this time?

Mr. ARENTZ. Not for this land but for the purposes enumerated; yes. There is a demand in certain sections.

For instance, I might refer to the Imperial Valley. They are building highways there; and everything except certain sections or little ridges included in this area, is sand. It would be a ridiculous proposition to haul sand from San Diego, for instance, or from some far point in Arizona, but under the law you can not lease the land for the securing of gravel without such legislation as this. I think this bill originated in the Department of the Interior with the idea of leasing these gravel pits for the construction of highways through the Imperial Valley.

I do not believe there is any other section of the United States in which there is a demand for it. Now, it seems to me that if you apply it to gravel you must apply it to mineral locations. It is logical that we should have the land not only for gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc, but for all of these things; and surely if we apply it to gold, which we need at the present time, we can not foreclose the man who goes in there and finds deposits of lead and zinc which may, in fact, be found to contain gold.

Mr. TABER. But if he makes an entry, he can sell the gravel to these contractors for a big price, whereas the Government ought to get that revenue.

Mr. ARENTZ. Oh. no. The contract that will be entered into between the Government and the lessee will be to the effect that the Government will get a certain royalty and the price for the gravel will be reasonable. If it is not, of course, I would not be in favor of it.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I yield.

Mr. GILBERT. I gather from the colloquy that there is nothing in this bill which will add to the tillable farming area of the United States?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Nothing at all.

Mr. GILBERT. We farmers are very much opposed, in view of the overproduction, to increasing, through irrigation or otherwise, the tillable areas of farming land in the United

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The purpose is to get more gold into circulation by mining.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin a member of the committee?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I am not. The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee present who is opposed to the bill? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take this time largely to get further information as to the real operation of the reclamation law. Members of the Public Lands Committee are here in large numbers, and I wish to get some informative facts as to the reclamation law generally and as it is affected by this supposed relief act.

As I understand, when a reclamation project is opened to entry and entrymen secure their rights, they not only have title to the surface but they also have title to any mineral rights on the land they have entered.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No land is opened for entry for homestead purposes that has known minerals in it; but if a patent is issued and minerals are discovered later, they go with the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am taking the supposititious case of an irrigation project having been determined upon, whereupon certain land is withdrawn. The land is entered, and when an entryman gets the full rights for his specific 40, 80, or whatever acres it may be, does he secure only the surface rights or does he secure the rights to the mineral deposits?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The land has been classified as nonmineral. A homestcad entryman complies with the law and receives his patent. When his patent is issued he has not only the surface rights but the right to any minerals that may be later discovered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there not instances where land may be suitable for irrigation purposes and yet be mineral in character?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I should think such a case is conceivable. I think, however, it does not apply to this situation if the settlers on this land are taking what is commonly known as agricultural, nonmineral land. The lands we are trying to get at are probably the lands close to a dam in a mountain canyon not subject at all to agricultural development, but land that has some mineral in it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have examined the original act, and I wish to be corrected by those persons who are far better acquainted with the operations of the reclamation law than I pretend to be, and that is the act which this bill seeks to amend, that of June 17, 1902. I find nothing in this act which reserves any mineral rights so far as any of the projects that may be opened under the reclamation act are concerned. Am I correct in that position?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman is correct, as only agricultural land is set aside for farming by irrigation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is the difficulty I have as to the need for this law. The bill seeks to amend section 3 of the organic act relating to reclamation. Section 3 of that act gives this authority to the Secretary of the Interior:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, before giving the public notice provided for in section 4 of this act, withdraw from public entry the lands required for any irrigation works contemplated under the secretary of the second s templated under the provisions of this act and shall restore to public entry any of the lands so withdrawn when, in his judg-ment, such lands are not required for the purposes of this act.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. STAFFORD. In one minute I will yield to the gentleman.

There you have full authority vested in the Secretary of the Interior over these lands that he has withdrawn for the purpose of building irrigation projects to restore them to public entry. Now, you seek to supplement that authority by allowing him to still retain the lands and not restore them to public entry. If they were restored to public entry, I will ask the gentleman from Nevada or the gentleman from Idaho, would they not then be subject to the mining laws of the country?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; they would, if they were restored to public entry.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I am right in my contention.

I now yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. ARENTZ. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior he can retain certain lands adjacent to a reclamation project; and when I say "reclamation project," I mean the lands that are susceptible of irrigation. Always outside of that area there is marginal land which is not susceptible of irrigation, and beyond that also there is a protecting area which may entirely surround the area.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Ofttimes for flood purposes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes; and ofttimes for pasture, for protection purposes, or for town sites, and ofttimes just merely for the sake of preventing the lands immediately surrounding being considered natural domain on which livestock can range, in order to protect the settlers in that particular area. Now, they have gone farther than that, and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. French] brought in a bill which was passed providing for protection of the watershed adjacent to reservoir sites so that, in grazing, that area will not be a menace to the reservoir, in that the flood waters may bring down silt. Would the gentleman call that "irrigation land" up there on the hillsides used as a public range?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. ARENTZ. I would not, either.

Mr. STAFFORD. Those lands are not needed for the reclamation project.

Mr. ARENTZ. That is exactly what I am bringing out. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior he can have acreage adjacent to the reclamation project classified, and he can wait 40 years before he classifies it, and put it back under the public domain. You take the Imperial Valley, the gentleman from New York knows perfectly about that, and you take from the Colorado River clear over to the Coast Range and running from the Mexican border to Coachello Valley—nearly all that land at the present time is withdrawn for irrigation purposes. How much will ultimately be retained under the reservation? Very likely twothirds or three-fourths of it; but they do not know where the all-American canal is going, they do not know where certain protection works along the river are going to be located, and so they have withdrawn all of it. I do not know how many square miles there are in that area, but I guess there are thousands, and within that area there are gravel pits, and across that area there are highways to be constructed. The gravel bars are of such a nature and located in such a way that it is necessary that they be used in the economical construction of the highways and used for other purposes, possibly for irrigation works, but under the law that gravel pit can not be used except by the Government. The proposal of this bill is to permit the leasing of these gravel pits to the contractor who is going to build the highway; and if I have not made the picture clear, I do not know how to make it clear.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I glean from the exposition of the gentleman from Nevada, it seems that you are vesting in the Secretary of the Interior authority for him to go into the gravel and lumber business.

That instead of carrying out the provisions of the original act, when land is no longer needed for irrigation purposes, he is to reopen them to public entry, you are permitting the Secretary of the Interior to say, "No; I will keep that land and go into the gravel and lumber business under such terms as I think reasonable for road construction." Am I in error in that construction?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The gentleman is in error. The Secretary of the Interior, under the present law, can vacate the land now. We want him to vacate certain rights and retain certain other rights.

Mr. STAFFORD. To go into the business of selling gravel and selling timber.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. This is not the intention for the Government to sell, it is the right to transport the gravel——

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I misunderstood the gentleman from Nevada. I understood him to say that the Secretary of the Interior wanted the right to retain the gravel in the pits and the timber for construction of roads and public highways that would later be developed. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. ARENTZ. I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin explains it in the right light. The bill is specific. Some of the territory within the irrigation reservation contains certain things. Under the present law, they can go on the land only for the purposes of locating a homestead or putting water on it. Now, the land is not susceptible of such location; you can not locate on it and you can not put water on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will not deny that under the original act the Secretary of the Interior has authority to open the land to public entry.

Mr. ARENTZ. Public entry for what purpose?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mineral rights and surface rights.

Mr. ARENTZ. The land was reserved for a specific purpose in the interest of reclamation projects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me read the original act, the organic act.

He shall restore to public entry any of the land so withdrawn when in his judgment such lands are required for the purposes of this act.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman knows that you can not draw a circle around the provisions made for any discretion lodged in the Secretary of the Interior. In other words, it is law by regulation.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that is what you are trying to do here; you are attempting to make law by regulation. The original law states that the lands no longer needed shall be open to public entry, and all the public then has the same right to them.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does it say anything about six months or two years?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; they have the right at any time.

Mr. ARENTZ. And there you are.
Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I understand that because of the freedom with which our mineral resources are being wasted, the President of the United States has recently appointed a commission headed by former Secretary of the Interior Mr. Garfield, to see what steps ought to be taken to preserve the Government's rights in its public domain. Does the gentleman know whether that commission has considered this measure and given it its approval?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's query—

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. The gentleman from New York addressed a question to me. I know that the gentleman from California is all-wise about public lands; but permit me just for a moment.

Mr. SWING. I thank the gentleman for the compliment he pays me, which is somewhat higher, probably, than I

Mr. TABER. It would seem that proper steps ought to be taken to protect the Government's public lands, and I am wondering if the gentleman knows whether or not the approval of that commission has been granted to such a measure as this.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has subordinated his great knowledge in such a humble way that I am glad now to yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing] to reply to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, the answer to the gentleman's query is that there is no such commission. I think the inquiry was not prompted for the purpose of securing information but was for the purpose of consuming time.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman mean that it is improper for us to find out what the bills are about before they are passed? It looks to me as if that is the gentleman's attitude, instead of having in mind the public interest. I think before we pass important bills of this character we ought to protect the interest of the public.

Mr. STAFFORD. Along that line, I want to inquire how many acres of land this bill will affect? I had that noted when I examined the bill on the Consent Calendar. I thought it was too important to be taken up on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to reply to the query of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I withdraw my question temporarily and allow the gentleman to reply to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Perhaps the gentleman from New York is not interested in an answer to his question.

Mr. TABER. Oh, I am.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Colorado is coming to the relief of the gentleman from California, and I yield for that purpose.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. In the hearings before the Public Lands Committee of the House, that exact question was asked of Mr. Wilson, of New Mexico, who followed ex-Secretary of the Interior Garfield in explaining the commission's report and a pending bill. If his statement can be construed as the expression of the Garfield Commission, it is that such matters as are covered by this bill, namely, sand, gravel, and building stone, were included in the considerations of their commission, and it was intended that hereafter those should be known as minerals. This bill just adds to the present existing law such things as may be included in the words "construction materials" for the construction of irrigation works. Everything else in the bill in the preceding lines 1 to 5 on page 2 is in the present law. When withdrawal is made for construction purposes under the Federal reclamation laws and the land goes back and is opened for location, whether mineral or any other, and a | in this House and risked his life for his country and his flag patent is written, it is written with reservation of rights of way and easements under present law. This bill adds the right to the removal of construction materials from the land for use in the construction of irrigation works. Since the gentleman wanted to know what the Garfield Commission thought about extending the power of the Secretary of the Interior, I thought he was entitled to an answer.

Mr. TABER. That is just what I wanted to know.

Mr. STAFFORD. I again repeat the question. I really wish to know how many acres will be affected by this bill, if it is enacted into law?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not know, to be frank with the gentleman. The bill was prepared by the Interior Department. In the consideration of it we sent for Judge Finney, one of the attorneys of the Interior Department, and asked him that question, among others. He said two or three cases had arisen in California where it seemed desirable that these people be permitted to occupy the land in a dual way—to mine it, the Government still controlling the title to some degree-and we asked how many acres, how many cases there were, and he said that he knew of two cases in California. A mining claim could not, under the law, exceed 20 acres. So far as Judge Finney knew, there were probably 40 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, the gentleman from Nevada is pursuing a red-herring trail when he says this will likely increase the gold production. If it is applicable to only 40 acres, even though the 40 acres were in the district of the gentleman from California, it will hardly increase the gold production.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. It is probably very rich land if it is in that district.

Mr. STAFFORD. Rich on the surface or the subsurface? Mr. EVANS of Montana. The subsurface.

Mr. STAFFORD. Their riches I think are only on the surface, so far as California is concerned. If there are only 40 acres, then this is a minor bill, and I regret to say that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] must have the wrong slant in thinking the bill if passed would increase the gold production or even the silver production of the country. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I crave the indulgence of my colleagues for a few minutes, which I shall use in an attempt to right a wrong that has been done one of our distinguished colleagues.

I do not believe there is a man in this House who is more earnest, more sincere, more faithful, more loyal, and more patriotic than our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. [Applause.] I think it is an outrage on justice and decency for any great newspaper in the United States like the Chicago Tribune to malign him, as was done by it editorially on Monday.

I was in this House in April, 1917, when war was declared. The gentleman from New York patriotically voted for every measure requested by President Wilson. Immediately after voting for the war risk insurance act and other matters that were necessary in order to carry on that war, I saw the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] appear in his uniform and tell us good-by, and then leave immediately for the battle front. He remained in the service until after the armistice. He was decorated with the war cross and made a knight commander of the Crown of Italy for his valiant

He gave up his high position in this House when he did not know that it would be held for him.

When this Chicago Tribune last Monday said that he was "an alien in mind and spirit from Americanism," it did not speak the truth. Our friend, Major LaGuardia, was born in the city of New York. He was raised in the State of Arizona. His father gave loyal, faithful service to our flag as a soldier in our United States Army for more than 20 years, and finally gave up his life by reason of disability suffered from that service. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LA-GUARDIA] when war was declared, gave us his honored place 'lenged.

[applause], and it is not true or right for a great newspaper to malign him and say that he is an alien in mind and spirit from Americanism.

This paper went further than that. It said that Mr. LA-Guardia "has no loyalty to our form of government." That is not true. What greater loyalty could he have displayed than risking his life for his country? On foreign battle fields his life was in danger many times.

I have disagreed with the gentleman from New York on some subjects. I have disagreed with him on the question of prohibition, very vitally. That is a fundamental disagreement between us. He is a constitutional wet and I am a fundamental dry. When he is fighting against prohibition he is a king in the eyes of the great Chicago Tribune. The Chicago Tribune then has nothing but eulogy and encomium for him when he is fighting for the wet cause. I have crossed swords with him many times on that subject. I have crossed swords with him on this floor on other subjects. He is the author of the LaGuardia anti-injunction bill he recently passed in the House, and I was one of the 13 Members who voted against it, and I fought it from this floor. But I want to say that I consider Major LaGuardia honest, sincere, patriotic, and fearless, even though I differ with him on some vital issues, and I deem it an honor to serve with him. I have fought many battles with him, shoulder to shoulder, for the people here.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SPARKS. Is it not a fact that when he is fighting the fight of the common people of this country is when this newspaper says he is an alien?

Mr. BLANTON. That is true. The gentleman correctly answers his own question. It is only when Major LaGuardia is fighting a fight against special privilege and in behalf of all the people that the Chicago Tribune tries to crucify him. It is not right. I want my friends to remember this, too, that when a proposed contract was brought in on this floor which would have given away Muscle Shoals to one of the multimillionaires of this country, Major LaGuardia led the fight that prevented it. I have been told that a big lawyer received $100,000 for drawing that contract and trying to lobby it through Congress. That was the first Muscle Shoals contract that was brought before us for ratification, away back about 10 years ago. It was Mr. LaGuardia who stood up here and led the fight against giving away Muscle Shoals. I followed him then. I worked with him. He is a good worker. He works effectively. I considered it an honor to serve with him then in his fight. I am willing to follow any sincere Member when he is right. There were just a handful of Members here who followed him then, and we were outvoted, as usual. We had the steam roller run over us, and the bill passed here by an overwhelming vote, but the fight that was started here, led by Major LaGuardia, was taken up in the Senate, and that bill did not become a law, and Muscle Shoals, now the greatest power plant on earth, has been saved to the people of the United States. It was Major LaGuardia's fight that helped to save it.

I wish to say that notwithstanding he is a fundamental wet, I do not believe there is a more valuable man in this House than Major LaGuardia. I am his friend. I will go to the mat for him at any time when he is unjustly attacked. I get after him about his wet views, and his hog-tying the peoples' courts with anti-injunction bills, but I will not let any newspaper or anybody question his sincerity or loyalty or patriotism.

This paper further said about him that "he shows every indication that he is willing to destroy our Government." That is untrue. That charge is wholly without foundation.

What has there been about the loyal, patriotic, faithful service of Major LaGuardia in this House and for his country abroad that shows "an indication to be willing to destroy his Government"? That is outrageous. It is untrue. It is unfair. It is unjust. It ought not to stand unchalMr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman please name the paper? Mr. BLANTON. It was the great Chicago Tribune.

Mr. BACON. I wanted to make it clear that it was not a New York City paper.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, certainly not. Certainly not. There is not a paper in New York that would question his loyalty or patriotism. Not even William Randolph Hearst, who is trying to put this sales tax over, would permit any of his papers to question Major LaGuardia's honesty or patriotism. He has held many positions of honor and trust, both in New York and for the Government, and has always proven true and faithful. [Applause.]

To show how Major LaGuardia is respected and esteemed in the Nation's Capital I will mention that the Washington Post has a section where it mentions citizens it deems worthy of note, headed "Post Gallery of Notables." Under it is carried the photograph of certain citizens of national note, with a brief write-up of their service. In this Washington Post this morning it carries none other than Major LaGuardia, and under said heading in large type, "Post Gallery of Notables," appears a splendid picture of our distinguished colleague from New York, and just below appears the following:

REPRESENTATIVE FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA

REPRESENTATIVE FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA

Stocky, swarthy, dynamic, Representative Fiorello H. LaGuardia (Republican), of New York, who has been in the national spotlight recently because of his fight against the sales tax, is one of the best fighters in the House, because he is convincing and fights good-humoredly enough but with vim and sticks with his fight.

But fighting parliamentary battles is merely the present phase of his scrappiness. He was an American aviator in the World War and commanded the American flying force on the Italian front, for which service he was decorated with the war cross and was made a knight commander of the Crown of Italy.

When the United States entered the World War Mr. LaGuardia was a Member of the House of Representatives. Fearful that some official effort might be made to stop him entering the Army he sneaked away and was in the Army and on the high seas before his colleagues were aware of the reason for his absence from the House. He didn't even tell the recruiting officers he was a Member of Congress; neither did he resign, because he was afraid that might start complications. He just went to war and when he came back with the rank of major his seat was waiting for him.

Mr. LaGuardia was born in New York City on December 11, 1882. He attended high school in Prescott, Ariz., returned to New York, won his law degree, and entered the Consular Service. Returning, he became an interpreter at Ellis Island. He began to practice law in 1910 and was named deputy attorney general in 1915. He was elected to the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses. He was president of the board of aldermen, candidate for mayor, and generally active in politics, returning to Congress in 1923. He has been reelected each time since. (J. B. McD.)

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has just been speaking about one distinguished veteran of this House. I want to take just two or three minutes to call your attention to a matter affecting all veterans which I do not believe you know about. I was very much surprised when I heard about it, and I want to bring it to your attention. I hope some of the members of the Veterans' Committee are here, because I expect it is new

I have learned that the Veterans' Bureau is to-day charging veterans 6 per cent who have made loans through banks as distinguished from loans made through the Veterans' Bureau. I did not know it until a day or two ago, but that is what is happening, and I do not believe all of the veterans know it as yet.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. In other words, banks are charging 6 per

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. No. That is the point I want to make. The banks all over this country were asked to help the veterans out when this first loan was made. They were asked to help them discount their certificates and in that way get the money into circulation. I find the bureau is now taking the position that all of those loans which were discounted by the banks and then sent to the bureau are discounted at the rate of 6 per cent, whereas the banks only charged them 41/2 per cent. However, when the loans made by the banks are sent to the Veterans' Bureau the veterans are then charged 6 per cent, and that is the difference which is made between loans made to veterans through banks and loans made direct through the

Mr. RANKIN. In other words, the banks do not get 6 per

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. No. This is unfair to the banks, and they can not explain it to the veterans. As I have said, the banks all over the country were asked to help these boys by making these loans, and when they made the loans they received 4½ per cent, but when they send the loans to the Veterans' Bureau the bureau charges the veterans 6 per cent. I believe that should be corrected.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is referring to adjusted-service certificates?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Virginia that that legislation does not come to the Veterans' Committee but goes to the Ways and Means Committee, the same committee that has brought out a sales tax.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I am glad to have that correction, and I would like the Ways and Means Committee to know about this, because I do not believe it is generally known. Here is a letter from the bureau which explains the situation:

Washington, March 1, 1932. Norfolk National Bank of Commerce & Trusts,

Norfolk, Va

Norfolk, Va.

Dear Sirs: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of February 18, 1932, transmitting copy of a letter from your bank addressed to this administration dated January 28, 1932. A thorough search fails to disclose the receipt of the original letter dated January 28, 1932, by this administration.

With reference to the notices forwarded to the veterans advising them of the redemption of their certificates by the Veterans' Administration and stating that interest will accrue on the amount paid the bank at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, compounded annually until paid, you are informed that in accordance with the provisions of section 502 (c) of the World War adjusted compensation act interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, compounded annually, is authorized on the amount per annum, compounded annually, is authorized on the amount paid the bank when certificates are redeemed by the Veterans' Administration. This provision of the act was not affected by Administration. This provision of the act was not affected by the amendment February 27, 1931.

Under the provisions of the act as amended February 27, 1931, the veterans may obtain further loans on the security of their adjusted-service certificates from this administration for an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the face value, provided there is an amount of $2 or more available after the amount and the activities are the amount of $2 or more available after the amount.

there is an amount of $2 or more available after the amount paid the bank plus accrued interest has been deducted. The rate of interest charged on these loans is governed by the Federal reserve rate in effect in the fourth Federal reserve district, but in no case may exceed 4½ per cent compounded annually.

If the veterans are entitled to a further loan, note (Form 1185), a copy of which is inclosed, should be properly executed and forwarded to the Veterans' Administration, certificate accounts division, Arlington Building, Washington, D. C., for consideration in the event the veterans are not entitled to an additional loan from this administration interest will be charged as stated in the second paragraph of this letter.

Respectfully,

M. Collins,

Director of Finance.

I have a letter from Mr. John S. Alfriend, cashier of the Norfolk National Bank of Commerce & Trusts, bringing this to my attention. The letter reads as follows:

NORFOLK, VA., March 4, 1932.

HOD. MENALCUS LANKFORD

Hon. Menalcus Lankford, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Lankford: I am inclosing copies of letters in regard to loans secured by adjusted-service certificates. It seems to me that the Veterans' Administration is taking an unfair advantage of veterans who borrowed through banks at 4½ per cent, as permitted under the World War adjusted compensation act, and are now being penalized to the extent of 1½ per cent because their applications for loans were not originally placed with the Government administration. administration.

administration.

If the Veterans' Administration has correctly interpreted the act, then I am of the opinion that this should be amended, inasmuch as, due to the tightening of credit, a large number of veterans' loans are being forwarded to Washington for redemption by the various banks in which the loans were originally made. Neither the veterans nor the banks were advised as to this peculiarity in the act, and I personally believe that the matter was completely overlooked at the time the amendment was put into effect.

Harold Masengill informs me that he will see you over the weekend and will at that time go more fully into the matter with you. You will readily understand that if interest is to accrue on these veterans' notes at the rate of 6 per cent the remaining one-half due the veterans will be dissipated in one-fourth less time than those veterans who were fortunate enough to have made their original loans direct with the bureau.

With kind personal regards, I am, Yours very truly,

JOHN S. ALFRIEND, Cashier.

I simply want to say this is unfair to the banks, because they did not know it. They are being criticized by the veterans who have made loans through the banks, and the veterans are just beginning to understand it. They are being charged 6 per cent when they should be charged only 4½ per cent. It seems to me some way should be devised, either by the committee or by the bureau, to prevent this additional charge of 6 per cent, which will eat up these certificates in a very short time.

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SWICK. Does the gentleman feel it is fair to charge even 41/2 per cent to these veterans?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. That can not be changed now, and I am not discussing the 41/2 per cent at the present time. However, at some future time that might be corrected, and I hope it will be. That is not the question now.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry. On Calendar Wednesday, as I understand, under the rules of the House general debate does not mean debate on general subjects, unassociated with the legislation presented to the House for consideration. The purpose of Calendar Wednesday is to permit the standing committees to bring to this House for discussion and action legislation which they believe should be enacted into law. General debate, under the rules relating to Calendar Wednesday, must be confined to the bill. I did not desire to take the gentleman off the floor, but I shall hereafter feel compelled to ask that the rules be observed.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Knowing the interest of the gentleman in the veterans and veterans' relief, I am sure he would not object. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall take all of the five minutes; but as I read the report of the committee that accompanies this legislation, I noticed one point in it which always challenges my interest, and I am taking just a minute or two in order that I may have this particular matter cleared up.

I think those who have noted the attitude I have taken on reclamation projects know that whenever I see the word "reclamation" or the word "irrigation" in any new bill I naturally have my attention attracted to it. Because of that fact I want to direct an inquiry or two to those in charge of Upon its face this seems to be a bill that has to do with mineral lands, but as you read the report-a major part of it: that upon section 3—the bill seems to have more to do with the materials that are to be used or possibly secured from these lands to be used in connection with reclamation projects and irrigation projects than it really has to do with minerals themselves. I am using this minute or two to ask for an explanation on that particular point. I think we are entitled to an absolutely frank and fair statement from those in charge of the bill as to the part that particular feature has in connection with this bill. I am sure there are distinguished engineers and others here who can give us the light needed on this particular point, and I will be glad to hear from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not quite grasp what it is the gentleman desires.

Mr. KETCHAM. If the gentleman will direct his attention to page 2 of the report, he will find that the major portion of that paragraph deals with a discussion of the question of how these materials upon these lands may be used for construction on reclamation projects and irrigation projects and the like. I just want to know what is really back of all this proposition, whether in its major aspects it is really what it purports to be on its face, or whether there is some great scheme back in the mind of somebody looking toward some great irrigation or reclamation project that is going to be launched in the future. If the latter is the object, I think the gentleman knows what my attitude would be on the bill, and I would not be disposed to let it go through without resorting to every parliamentary means in my power to prevent it.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think, perhaps, the gentleman's attitude and the chairman's attitude would be the same on that proposition.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am glad to know that. Mr. EVANS of Montana. I personally never heard of this bill until it came to the committee. I read it, and we then sent for Judge Finney, of the Interior Department, and asked him who drew the bill, why the bill was drawn, and somebody asked him, "Now, Judge, tell us what is back of it." We put it in just that language. He said:

There are two cases from California where mineral has been There are two cases from California where mineral has been discovered on land that has been withdrawn for reclamation purposes. They want to mine the mineral. They can not do it while it is in withdrawal. We do not want to vacate it entirely, but we are willing to vacate it partially. We want to reserve the right to take gravel off of that ground and we want to reserve the right to run a tramway over it and we want to reserve the right to take sand from it for our purposes in connection with this dam; in other words, we think the Government and the mining locator, if permitted, could make a dual use of this land to the benefit of the man and perhaps with no disadvantage to the Government.

Mr. KETCHAM. If he will permit, the gentleman has just indicated the suggestion that will answer my possible objection to the bill. While this bill is properly drawn in very general terms, do I understand that in reality its operation will be limited to just one particular situation?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. That is my understanding, and I get the understanding from Judge Finney and from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, which is all the information I have.

Mr. KETCHAM. If it has application only to one little situation, I would have no particular objection, but the bill is drawn in general terms.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I have confidence in the information I have received and I am sure that is the case.

The Clerk read the bill, with the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "vacate such withdrawal" and insert in lieu thereof "open the land to location, entry, and patent under the general mining laws."

Page 2, line 16, after the word "contract," strike out the word "to" and insert the words "which shall."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "recorded," insert the words "in the county records and United States local land office."

Page 3, line 6, after the word "patent," strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee whether it is understood that this bill applies only to that particular type of public land that has been withdrawn from "possible use for construction purposes under the Federal reclamation laws"? These are the words of lines 3 and 4, on page 1 of the bill, but I would like to have accentuated in the RECORD, if that is the fact, that this bill applies only to that particular type of public land and not to any other of the public lands withdrawn for many other purposes, such as oil, gas, oil shale, for survey, and a number of other purposes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. My understanding is that just those lands withdrawn for construction purposes are affected, and I gathered that understanding from a rather minute inquisition of Judge Finney, who drew the bill and represented to us that two or three California cases demanded this sort of legislation.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. And are the lands to which this bill particularly applies in the Boulder Dam area?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. He spoke of two California cases as the only cases he knew of.

Mr. ARENTZ. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that if it is contemplated to do this in the Boulder Dam area I am going to request the Congress to cut that Boulder Dam area down to the very limits of what is needed, because we have some very fine mineral territory in there that I want the prospectors to have unlimited rights on, and I do not want it curtailed as this bill curtails it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not this bill give that right to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. ARENTZ. Of course, it does.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now is the time to curtail his power if the gentleman is fearful of the exercise of such power.

Mr. ARENTZ. This bill can not shrink that area in any way. That is what I am talking about. I am talking about the area that is so broad now that it takes in a tremendous area. I am not referring to this bill; I am talking about the reserved area for reclamation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the area the gentleman refers to withdrawn for construction purposes?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes; but it is so broad that it covers a great deal of other territory that will never be needed.

Mr. STAFFORD. So this bill is drawn with a very broad purpose to cover that identic case?

Mr. ARENTZ. For instance, they do not know where the aqueduct is going to go to take the water out of Boulder Canyon. It may be taken out 100 miles below or it may come right to the reservoir; we do not know. We do not know where the power line is going. For that reason the Secretary says we must retain all this area until we find out where these conduits and so on are going to go, with the result that I can only say now, hasten the day when the actual location is decided upon so that we can determine when we want to shrink this area.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the bill is passed, the Secretary of the Interior will have the right to restore land not needed for public entry.

Mr. ARENTZ. Everywhere; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman's fears are not

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARKER of Georgia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8087) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to vacate withdrawals of public lands under the reclamation law with reservation of rights, ways, and easements, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms directed to notify absent Memmers, and the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Evans of Montana, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, this is Calendar Wednesday and the Public Lands Committee has the call. We have on our tentative calendar six or seven bills. We have now put in two and a half hours on one bill, against which there was apparently no serious opposition. No amendment was offered and no vote cast against it. It is manifest that there is some serious opposition to some bill on the calendar of the Public Lands Committee. A filibuster has been going on for two hours. I am told privately that the opposition is to the Florida Everglades bill. I do not speak advisedly, but I have reached the conclusion that if that bill is taken up no other bill on the committee's calendar will be reached.

In the interest of expeditious legislation for the Public Lands Committee, we have had a little meeting here and discussed the matter with the author of the bill, Mrs. Owen, the lady from Florida, and Mrs. Owen has generously authorized me to say that if that bill is standing in the way of expeditious legislation. I had her consent to say that that bill would not be called up to-day. I therefore make that statement for the benefit of the House, in the hope that we can proceed expeditiously on the other bills on the calendar. [Applause.]

THE TARIFF ON OIL

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the present revenue bill, H. R. 10236, was introduced in response to the President's urgent message for the speedy passage of a bill to provide revenue. The urgency of the situation with respect to the unbalanced Budget caused the consideration of such legis-

It is admitted on all sides that this is not a tariff measure. At the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee our distinguished colleague [Mr. CRISP], the acting chairman, stated that the task before the committee was a "most unpleasant duty," namely, to provide "taxes to produce suffi-cient revenue" to meet the deficit for 1933. There is thus no doubt as to the purpose of the bill, both from the message of the President and from the understanding of the committee itself. It would seem reasonable to expect that no proposal for a tax would be included in the bill unless it was for the purpose of producing revenue, the extent and amount of which could be reasonably estimated on the basis of past experience. The inclusion of the proposed tariff of 1 cent per gallon on imported petroleum and its products in a nontariff measure is therefore wrong in principle.

II. ONLY A NEGLIGIBLE AMOUNT OF REVENUE, IF ANY, CAN BE EXPECTED FROM THE PROPOSED TARIFF ON IMPORTED OIL

With a view of determining, if possible, what revenue might reasonably be expected, inquiry was made of the Secretary of the Treasury for information in that respect. The reply of Secretary Mills was as follows:

In the opinion of experts of the Department of Commerce, such a tax would yield no revenue, since the levy which would be added to the import price exceeds the margin of advantage on which oil is imported to this country and therefore would exclude the

It thus appeared, on reliable information, that no revenue could be expected from such a tax.

After the receipt of this information it seems that the committee itself estimated an expected income of $5,000,000. This was no doubt based on the amount of gasoline imported in 1931, to wit, about 546,000,000 gallons, and upon the assumption that imports would continue at the same rate in spite of the proposed tax. It thus appears that, in comparison to the amount of revenue from the proposed oil tax, even in the committee's enthusiastic expectation, would be negligible. In fact, it is the smallest item of revenue included in the committee's bill. (See Congres-SIONAL RECORD for March 11, 1932, p. 5787.)

III. THE PROPOSED TARIFF RUNS COUNTER TO THE SETTLED POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

Even if it be assumed that this tariff provision is properly part of a revenue bill and that it would produce an appreciable amount of revenue, it appears from a review of our tariff history that this is a new departure and is contrary to our settled policy. There has never been a tariff on crude petroleum and its related products. Both of the major political parties have recognized in their platforms the soundness of the proposition that petroleum and its products should be free from tariff. The Democratic platform for 1920 savs:

The Democratic Party recognizes the importance of the acquisition by Americans of additional sources of supply of petroleum and other minerals, and declares that such acquisition should, both at home and abroad, be fostered and encouraged.

The Republican platform for 1928 calls attention to crude petroleum, gasoline, and lubricating oil as "articles used by the farmers, which are on the free list," and thus implies a promise that they will continue to be on the free list.

This attitude toward having petroleum on the free list has been recognized by Congress. We find that in 1922 there were 130,000,000 barrels of crude oil imported into this country, as against only 47,000,000 in 1931. Nevertheless, in 1922 Congress left petroleum on the free list.

Again, in 1929, the oil producers proposed that in the tariff then under consideration a tariff should be imposed on crude petroleum and on the products derived therefrom. But both the House and Senate, after extended investigation and lengthy deliberation, denied such efforts. Again, in 1930, the subject was before Congress when an attempt was made to place an embargo on the importation of oil, and Congress again took no action thereon.

After mature consideration by several Congresses oil was thus recognized to be one of the natural resources like pulp. copper, and others, which, by design and not by oversight, were left without a tariff, and the reasons for this conclusion, deliberately arrived at, with respect to oil, are not far to seek. Not only are gasoline, fuel oil, and other petroleum products of vital necessity in motor transportation, in industry, in shipping, and in many other ways but it is recognized that our petroleum supply is limited and irreplaceable. The statistics compiled by Government bureaus show that the United States produces and consumes about 68 per cent If this increase in the cost of fuel oil is passed on to the of the world's oil. But we have within our borders only about 18 per cent of the estimated world's underground

This rapid rate of exhaustion of our own supply has been recognized as a matter for serious consideration. The conservation of the supply is a national necessity. The United States has therefore encouraged the investment of American capital in foreign oil fields and the importation of petroleum and its products. In the first report of the Federal Oil Conservation Board the board advises that oil companies should vigorously acquire and explore foreign fields as a source of supply under the control of our own citizens.

The report made in 1931 by the Bureau of Mines to the Commerce Committee of the Senate says:

Having thus encouraged American oil companies to develop foreign oil production, it might be considered that there had been established an implied obligation to continue in the assistance of American companies engaged in foreign oil production, and that the restriction or refusal of admission to the United States of oil so produced would be contrary to the encouragement which these companies have received while engaged in foreign oil exploration and development work.

In view of this repeated recognition of policy with respect to oil, there can be no serious doubt that the tariff now proposed in the revenue bill is contrary thereto.

IV. THE PROPOSED TAX WILL INCREASE THE PRICE OF FUEL OIL AND WILL DIRECTLY AFFECT INDUSTRY, SHIPPING, WAGE EARNERS, FARMERS, HOME OWNERS, PUBLIC-SERVICE COMPANIES, ROAD BUILDING, AND OTHER INTERESTS

The sweeping effect of this proposed tax becomes evident on but slight reflection. Though it will produce no revenue for the Government, according to the experts, it will result in increasing the price of fuel oil, gasoline, and other widely used products of crude petroleum. It is reasonable to assume, and experience has shown, that the prices of petroleum products quickly follow the price changes of crude petroleum. In the 1928 report of the Federal Trade Commission, it is stated on page 175:

As a rule price advances in crude petroleum have been followed promptly by gasoline price increases

This conclusion can not be questioned. It is amply established by a mass of indisputable facts and figures collected in the August, 1931, issue of Petroleum Facts and Figures, published by the American Petroleum Institute and reprinted in the report of the hearings conducted by the Ways and Means Committee on this proposed tariff. (Pp. 50 to 56, inclusive.)

It is clear that users of fuel oil will be necessarily and promptly affected by the increase in price. Every State in the Union where manufacturing is carried on to any substantial extent is, of course, interested in having fuel for its industries at a proper price. In many industries, fuel enters to a substantial degree into the cost of production and thus constitutes a large factor in the selling price of articles manufactured. For example, in the finishing plants of the textile industry where gray goods are converted into marketable materials for consumers' use, the expense of fuel amounts to nearly 10 per cent of the entire manufacturing expense. In shipping, the proportion is even larger.

At the present time fuel oil-which is the residuum left after naphtha, gasoline, kerosene, and others of the more expensive products have been removed by the so-called cracking process—is obtainable on the Atlantic coast at less than 11/2 cents per gallon. An increase of 1 cent per gallon means an increase of about 70 per cent in the cost of fuel—a tremendous increase in this large and essential item of the cost of manufacture. The same proportion of increase in fuel cost-namely, nearly 70 per cent-will result to the shipping interests using fuel oil. It seems clear, beyond doubt, that the cost of fuel to such industries and to shipping will be nearly doubled by the advance in price of fuel oil which the proposed tariff will induce. Many of the industries have already found themselves in such condition that wages and employment were affected. This is most unfortunate. The plight of shipping is well known.

of employees will be affected. On the other hand, if this great increase in the cost of turning the wheels of industry should result in increasing the prices of the products manufactured and transported by these industries, then consumers generally will be affected. On any view of the situation that seems certain to follow in the wake of this tax, there can be no doubt that industry, shipping, wage earners, and consumers will all be affected thereby, and all with no revenue to the Government.

Asphalt, another product of crude petroleum, is necessary for the manufacture of roofing and road-building material. Only petroleum with an asphaltic base supplies this material, and there are only two sources within our own country where such petroleum is available, namely, California and a small area in Texas. The roofing manufacturers say that the proposed tax would materially increase the cost of roofing material and the road builders say that it would nearly triple the cost of road building. (See report of hearings, pp. 129 and 132.)

The farmers and the home owners also have a stake in this problem. The farmer has a direct interest in having manufactured goods come to him at as low a price as possible. It is evident that the prices of his tools, his equipment, his clothing, his roofing, his building materials, are all dependent in some degree on the cost to the manufacturer and shipper of the heat and power that turn the wheels of industry. If a fuel-oil tax is adopted, we add to the farmer's burden as well as to the already overburdened industries and to the millions of wage earners employed by them. This does not take into consideration the effects on the farmer of the increase in gasoline for his tractors, trucks, and other gasoline motors. It is no wonder that farmers' organizations are protesting against this tariff. Protests have already been received by the Committee on Ways and Means from the representative farmers' associations in Minnesota. Indiana, Nebraska, Ohio, South Dakota, Tennessee, New Hampshire, and elsewhere. (See report of hearings before Ways and Means Committee, p. 108.)

Oil as fuel is not only a basic necessity for industry, it has come to be used widely as a fuel for homes. The American Oil Burner Association reports that more than 750,000 homes have been equipped with oil burners and that $525,000,000 have been invested in the industry of producing oil burners for home. (See report of hearings before Ways and Means Committee, p. 119.) The American home owners using oil fuel will, of course, immediately feel the result of this tax. It can not, therefore, be denied that the effects of this tax will be far-reaching and will be felt by millions.

V. THE PROPOSED TAX IS UNFAIR FOR IT WILL BEAR DOWN PARTICULARLY ON THE STATES LOCATED AT A DISTANCE FROM OIL FIELDS

The Atlantic States have been obtaining some of their supply of fuel oil from petroleum originating in Venezuela. The Tariff Commission, in its report of February 1, 1932, to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, show that for the years 1929 and 1930 (for which years figures as to imports were available) they were with respect to fuel oils, as follows:

TOPPED OILS, INCLUDING FUEL OILS

Barrels of 42 gallons each: 1929____ _____ 20, 545, 498 _ 26, 080, 383 1930___

The consumption on the Atlantic coast, where these imports were received, was far in excess of the amounts imported, as appears by the report of the Bureau of Mines on deliveries of fuel oil, as follows:

	1930	1929
New England States Middle Atlantic States South Atlantic States	20, 618, 218 87, 284, 415 10, 410, 097	21, 829, 471 88, 721, 203 9, 953, 117

It is thus clear that the consumption of domestic fuel oil on the Atlantic seaboard is far in excess of the amount of such oil imported from foreign sources. The imported fuel oil naturally does not reach the States located at any great 1 Page 39.

wage earners engaged in those industries, tens of thousands | distance from salt water. The proposed tax is therefore in effect a tax bearing directly upon the people and the industries and the shipping of those States. The effect of it is the same as though those States were specifically named in the bill. The rise in price by reason of the tax will most directly affect those specific portions of the country and thus be highly discriminatory against the Atlantic States. Of course, a tax upon those industries will result in a rise in price of the products and thus indirectly affect the consumers of those products throughout the United States. But the direct effect of the tax will be upon those industries, upon their wage earners and home owners, and indirectly upon all of our people, including the farmers. It is plain that Congress could not single out the non-oil-producing States and impose a tax upon such States. That would be unconstitutional. The effect of the proposed tax produces exactly the same result by indirection, which the Constitution expressly prohibits.

> VI. THE PROPOSED TAX WILL ACTUALLY CREATE A DEFICIT TO THE GOVERNMENT RATHER THAN REVENUE

> In view of the exigency which occasioned the need for the present revenue bill, citizens must, of course, be prepared to bear tax burdens if such burdens would produce revenue. The only possible justification for the inclusion of any tax in the revenue bill would be as a revenue producer. But we find that the Government itself would suffer to the extent of millions in excess of any amount of revenue that could possibly be expected. Ludwell Denny, in We Fight For Oil, says:

> Current peace-time requirements of those branches of the Government responsible for the national defense are approximately 20,000,000 barrels of petroleum products a year.

It is to be noted that this Government consumption of 20,000,000 barrels is only peace-time requirements for national defense. The total consumption of the American Government is much in excess of this. But, taking only the 20,000,000 barrels, we have the following ridiculous result:

Used by American Government, 20,000,000 barrels per year; in gallons (42 gallons per barrel), 840,000,000 gallons

	$8,400,000
Estimated income from tax on imported oil, as assumed by the committee	5, 000, 000
Minimum net loss to American Government	3, 400, 000

Thus we see that the net result to the Government, on its own annual requirements for national defense, will be a substantial net loss. It is clear that at best the proposed tax does not produce revenue but creates a deficit. It leads to the ridiculous conclusion of the necessity of raising further revenue to cover this new deficit.

VII. THE PROPOSED TAX WILL REDUCE OUR EXPORTS TO VENEZUELA

The great importance of foreign trade to our wage earners and industries can not be overestimated. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the United States Department of Commerce (Bulletin No. 783) reports that Venezuela is buying from us 55 per cent of all the goods which she imports, and says:

Since the World War Venezuela has become of increasing interest to the American public, primarily through the intensive development of its oil fields, but also because of the increased trade between the two countries.

We sell Venezuela food products and increasingly large amounts of manufactured goods. (See bulletin of U.S. Department of Commerce No. 783, pp. 46-48.) Venezuelan imports from and exports to the United States for 1913 and from 1926 to 1929 were as follows:

	Our ex- ports to Venezuela	Our imports from Venezuela
1913	6, 829, 000 44, 063, 000	8, 335, 000 18, 926, 000
1927 1928 1129	36, 058, 000 46, 069, 000 48, 179, 000	19, 896, 000 32, 619, 000 42, 308, 000

The growth of our exports to Venezuela has thus been | both of crude and refined oils, were only about 10 per cent steadily and substantially increasing. The comparison of the figures of recent years with 1913 is impressive. Our Department of Commerce, Bulletin No. 783, page 40, recognizes that "the importance of petroleum in this rapid trade development is striking." It is the export of petroleum and its products that furnishes Venezuela a means of payment and therefore has established it as a good potential customer. The trade balance with Venezuela has been steadily in our favor, as shown by the above schedule. Our total imports from Venezuela in 1930 aggregated $36,868,010 (p. 46). Of this amount, nearly $26,000,000 consisted of petroleum and its products (p. 46). In other words, more than 72 per cent of the payment by Venezuela for our goods is in petroleum and its products. If by reason of this tax imports from Venezuela are cut off, as the Treasury Department says they will be, Venezuela will have to look for other markets for her petroleum and its products. Venezuela must and will import from those countries that buy her oil. It follows that our foreign trade with Venezuela will be greatly reduced. The effect of this reduction in our export trade will, of course, further reflect upon our industries and wage earners. Our foreign trade is not in such condition that we can afford to tamper with it-it has already fallen off nearly 40 per cent from 1927-and we must carefully foster and develop our remaining foreign markets.

VIII. THE PROPOSED TAX WILL NOT HELP THE INDEPENDENT OIL PRO-DUCERS

The proponents of the tax have laid stress on the plight of the independent oil producers. Their spokesman, Mr. Wirt Franklin, told the Ways and Means Committee about the condition in which owners of small wells that produce a barrel and a half a day find themselves, and urged this proposed tax as a measure for assisting these small independent oil producers. He overlooked the fact that by reason of general conditions, industry, farming, and business generally face similar price conditions in practically all commodities. The home owner is in the same condition. The Department of Labor shows that the price index declined generally between January, 1931, and December, 1931. To take a few examples:

Item	Index for January, 1931	Index for December, 1931
Farm products. Semimanufactured articles Raw material Textiles Miscellaneous Oil	73. 5 73. 4 72. 9 71. 0 64. 7 69. 8	55. 7 62. 2 60. 2 59. 2 56. 9 63. 6

It thus appears from a disinterested and reliable source that farming, textiles, and other industries generally have suffered more than oil in price reductions during 1931, and that in December, 1931, their price indices were lower than those of oil. If the oil industry is entitled to help, by means of the revenue bill, why are not the other industries? Thus the door will be opened for those interested in copper, pulp, fish, and in other necessary and designedly free materials to use this exigency of the revenue measure as a means for precipitating a discussion as to a change of tariff policy, and manufacturers and dealers in manufactured products will also, with as large a measure of justice, come forward and demand tariff legislation. The quick passage of a revenue bill will be rendered impossible, and we shall be plunged into the midst of a pulling and hauling tariff revision. result will be much noise and confusion and no present help to the Government and no balancing of the Budget.

But even aside from this important consideration, which must not be overlooked, an examination into the oil situation shows that the proposed tariff of 1 cent per gallon will not alleviate the conditions of the independent producer. The United States Tariff Commission reports (Report, February 1, 1932) that our country produced in 1931 about 850,000,000 barrels of crude petroleum. Our total imports for that year, of that amount; that is, about 86,000,000 barrels. These imports were as follows:

Crude petroleum Refined oils, including fuel oil, gasoline, etc	Barrels 47, 250, 000 38, 700, 000
Total	85 950 000

Our imports were thus but a small fraction of our production, and they had moreover decreased 24 per cent as compared with the year 1930.

The United States Tariff Commission reports show that the independents produce less than 20 per cent of the total amount of petroleum brought to the surface in our country; that they are in no position to compete with the few large and organized companies that produce the bulk of the petroleum. The troubles of the independents are clearly traceable not to any foreign competition but to the fact that a few corporations control the means of transportation, the refining and storage plants, and the marketing facilities for petroleum and its products.

Alfred M. Landon, the chairman of the Kansas delegation to the Governors' Oil Relief Conference, says:

To-day the greatest danger facing the oil industry is not from without but from within—and that danger is the elimination of competition through "integration," which is only a gentle-sounding phrase under which a monopoly masquerades.

Having no storage capacity, no means of transportation except the one in the control of the few large companies. no consignee or purchaser other than those corporations, the independent is obliged to accept what those companies see fit to give him as the price of crude petroleum.

The Independent Monthly of the Petroleum Association of America in its issue of July-August, 1931, shows that out of a base price at tidewater of 85 cents a barrel only 10 cents per barrel went to the producer of the petroleum. Of the remainder, 40 cents was the so-called trunk-line charge for transportation,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  cents was figured into the price as a "gathering charge,"  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents as a ship-loading charge, and 20 cents as a "service charge," or premium to the parent corporation. These indisputable figures are most significant. They show the result of the monopolistic control of transportation by pipe line, which is not subjected to such regulation as other carriers, like railroads. Here is the great cause of the condition of the independent. It is evident, therefore, that the troubles of the independent producers will in no way be remedied by the proposed tax of 1 cent per gallon. He will still remain in the grip of this monopoly, and will still be without means of transportation, refining, loading, or marketing.

Surely, it can not be argued that it is the large integrated companies that are languishing for want of this tax of 1 cent per gallon, because those companies have apparently not been hit by the depression at all. We find that during these years of depression they have paid enormous dividends. From a compilation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its statement, No. 3170, we find that for the year 1930 six large pipe-line companies have declared dividends ranging from 40 to 338 per cent.

Surely those companies need no tariff assistance at the expense of the rest of the country, and the independents who find themselves in the iron grip of these large integrated corporations can not possibly benefit from the further depression which will result to manufacturing, shipping, and farming interests from the proposed tax. This was recognized by the western group in Congress when the matter of an embargo on oil was discussed in 1931. Said Senator ASHURST, of Arizona (Congressional Record for March 2, 1931, pp. 6722-6723):

We are asked, in behalf of the Sinclairs and the Dohenys, to put an embargo upon the importation of oil. Mr. President, there is larger question here than the mere question of serving the oil interests and the Dohenys and the Sinclairs of this country. Are we going to levy a tax, already too heavy, upon every person who uses an automobile, upon every farmer who has a motor upon his farm, in order to swell the profits, already great, of the oil industry?

The Senator must have read the record of the tremendous dividends declared by those companies. He referred only to users of gasoline who would be taxed, but his statement holds true with respect to those fuel-oil users who would be the victims of such a tax; neamly, the great industries, shipping, the wage earners, and the home owners.

IX. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

In this national emergency which imperatively demands the speedy balancing of the Budget, a tariff measure is entirely out of place. There is no time for the careful investigation of the plight of other industries, their comparative conditions, the complicated results, and all the numerous incidents accompanying tariff legislation. The proposed tax opens the door wide to demands by other industries equally distressed and with an equal measure of justice. The soundness of the principle that tariff legislation should not be confused with emergency revenue measures is made clear when we consider the confusion and delay that will inevitably follow the opening of the doors to these numerous demands for tariff legislation.

The proposed oil tariff is not only out of place but it will produce no revenue. Citizens might be resigned to added burdens of taxation even in these hard times if at least the taxes imposed resulted in revenue. But the only possible justification for the proposed tax disappears when we find not only lack of revenue but a direct and positive deficit to the Government itself on its own peace-time requirements for national defense.

It has been shown that the burdens to industry, to the wage earners, to commerce, to the farmer, to the home owner, which the proposed tax involves, will be many and far-reaching. It does not even have the redeeming feature of helping the independent oil producers, for whose sole benefit it is ostensibly proposed. The corporations that exercise a monopolistic control over the means of transportation, refining, storing, distributing, and selling the oil, certainly do not need it. And when, to top all, it appears that it is contrary to our established policy, and that it will substantially interfere with our foreign trade, it would seem that the last vestige of justification for including such legislation in the emergency revenue bill disappears.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR USE OF EASTERN NEW MEXICO NORMAL SCHOOL

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands, I call up the bill (H. R. 6679) granting certain public lands to the State of New Mexico for the use and benefit of the Eastern New Mexico Normal School, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up the bill H. R. 6679, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute for the House bill Senate bill 1590.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to substitute for the House bill the Senate bill S. 1590. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the consideration of the Senate bill, but I wish it understood that it occupies the same legislative status as the other.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The bill being on the Union Calendar, the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate bill, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. PARKER, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1590, with Mr. PARKER of Georgia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. This bill is designed to grant certain lands to the State of New Mexico. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. Chavez] such time as he may desire for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill is simply to carry out the noble purpose of advancing the greatest of all American institutions, the cause of education. New Mexico, as you know, is a large State and was originally settled only in the western portion. In 1912, when we were admitted into the Union, we were granted certain lands, and 200,000 acres of those lands were specifically set aside for normal-school purposes. The great eastern section of New Mexico was very sparsely settled at the time, but the men who drafted the constitution of our State, under the enabling act, realizing that eventually that part of the State would be settled, set aside out of the original 200,000 acres 30,000 acres for normal-school purposes within the eastern section of the State. Within the last few years many citizens of Texas, Oklahoma, Missouri, Ohio, and other parts of the country have gone into this particular territory, and I can inform the House now that practically 50 per cent of our high-school graduates come from within a radius of about 120 miles of the normal school that is intended to be benefited by this legislation. In 1927 the State of New Mexico created the Eastern New Mexico Normal School to meet the needs of the people of that section, and also sought to take the 30,000 acres originally set aside for that purpose, but we have not enough. This bill asks only for a grant of the acreage mentioned in the bill, so that this particular normal school will be on even terms with the normal schools in the oldest settled parts of the State. It is absolutely necessary that we have this legislation if we are to go forward in our State. It is sparsely settled. it is poor in wealth. The Government has large tracts of Government domain within that State, and all we ask, in all sincerity, of this House is to look at our condition and permit us to carry out this purpose. We are not asking for this land to do with as we see fit. All we ask is that this land be granted to the State of New Mexico and a trust be created to help us out with education.

Gentlemen will notice a report from the Interior Department with reference to this bill. There are no serious objections from this source. The members of the committee will recall that the last Congress passed legislation which created a public lands commission. That commission, appointed by the President under authority of this Congress, has gone into all of the 11 so-called public-domain States of the West and has reported back to this Congress and to the Executive authority that the remaining unreserved and nonmineral public domain be ceded to all of the States, and, carrying out the provisions of that report, there is now before the Public Lands Committee of the House an administration measure by which the States will get all of the public domain that is unreserved and unappropriated, without the minerals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill does not extend to unsurveyed lands. It specifically provides for surveyed lands.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes. The other applies to unreserved lands remaining in the public domain, with the exception of what is reserved for forest reserves and other governmental purposes. If it is proposed to give to the States all of the public domain, we do not believe that we are asking at this time anything that is unreasonable, and I hope the Members of the House will help me to-day in carrying out the noble purpose of education in our State. That is all we ask.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. About what is the value of this land that you want given to the State?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I can answer that in this way. What is left of the public domain in New Mexico or elsewhere throughout the West is what you may classify in ordinary parlance as "the leavings," it is the least valuable land | that we could get. We could possibly lease it out for grazing purposes: and if you were to lease every acre, the most that we could get would be the average rental now paid in New Mexico for better lands, which would be 3 cents an acre. We have a provision in our constitution by which we are limited to a certain amount per acre in matters of sale.

Mr. SNELL. I can not see that this would be of very great value toward maintaining a normal school, if you could get only 3 cents an acre.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It would help us immensely. We hope that we may develop our other natural resources in the State, by which the State could carry on the greater burdens.

Mr. SNELL. That would be only about $900 or $1,000 a vear.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The amount would be small. But to us it means as much as a million or two to somebody else.

Mr. SNELL. What is the average price paid for grazing land in the gentleman's State?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Under a constitutional provision we can not sell them for less than $3 an acre, but even at that price it is impossible to dispose of it.

I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that of the land that has been granted to the State, which means millions of acres, we have only been able to dispose of some 100,000 acres by sale. It is impossible to sell it for the amount limited by the constitution of our State, under the enabling act. Does that answer the gentleman's ques-

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say that the President's Public Lands Commission recommends that all public lands, nonmineral in character, be given to the States.

Mr. SNELL. Would the States take them if they were given to them?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; not as a general proposition, but in a case like this where the State wants 200,000 acres and for a specific purpose.

Mr. SNELL. Why would they not take it all?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Because the surface right alone would be of no advantage to them. The cost of administration would amount to more than the States would receive from the lands.

Mr. COLTON. It is a liability instead of an asset, in many instances, that is being transferred to the States.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a policy of the States to throw the liabilities on the National Government and take the assets for their own benefit.

Mr. COLTON. If the National Government will give us fee-simple title to the lands, that is an entirely different proposition, but they are reserving all the worth-while lands and giving us the remnants, not worth anything.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the House made certain amendments in the estate tax. I have asked the Secretary of the Treasury, for our information, to submit an estimate of the yield under the Ramseyer amend-

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the information of the House.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if I understand the gentleman this is a letter from Secretary Mills telling how much more this tax would yield under the Ramseyer amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. This is an estimate of the Treasury Department of the additional revenue that the Ramseyer amendment will earn.

Mr. PATTERSON. It will earn more than the bill which the committe brought in?

Mr. HAWLEY. It was estimated that the estate-tax rates proposed by the committee in the bill would earn for the fiscal year 1933, $25,000,000 over and above the amount produced under existing law. This estimate was made on the assumption that the bill would become effective at a much earlier date than is now possible. If the bill should become law by May 1, the new rates under the Ramseyer amendment will be effective only during two months of the fiscal year 1933. On that assumption the estate-tax rates proposed by the committee would produce for the fiscal year 1933, $12,000,000, while the Ramsever amendment would produce some $20,000,000 during the fiscal year 1933, or $8,000,000 more than the amount that would be earned under the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. I shall not object, but I wish to make this observation: The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Ram-SEYER] is not here, and this is so far from what the gentleman estimated that I suppose it is about as correct as the estimate of the present Secretary of the Treasury when he asked the committee to return that $190,000,000 to the taxpayers in 1929.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman state what the total amount is? The membership is interested in that.

Mr. HAWLEY. The additional revenue estimated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, is $20,000,000, and for the next fiscal year is $135,000,000. I submit the letter for the information and consideration of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,

Washington, March 23, 1932.

My Dear Mr. Hawley: You have requested that the Treasury submit an estimate of the probable yield of the revised estate tax rates which were adopted by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole as an amendment to section 401 of H. R. 10236, the so-called Ramseyer amendment. I am glad to comply with your request.

The additional revenue to be derived under the Ramseyer amend-

The additional revenue to be derived under the Hamseyer amendment during the first full fiscal year in which those rates will be effective, that is, the fiscal year 1933-34, will, in our judgment, not exceed $135,000,000. This is a liberal estimate.

So far as the fiscal year 1933 is concerned, for which the House of Representatives is now budgeting, the amendment will not in all probability yield much in excess of $20,000,000. It is obvious that the proposed tax bill can not become law before the first of May, if then. The new rates would only apply to the estates of decedents dying after the new law goes into effect. The estate-tax returns and the Federal estate tax are not due until a year after the date of death, and payment of the tax may be postponed under certain conditions for a period of three years. It is apparent, therefore, that under the most favorable circumstances payments under the new rates will only be received during the last two months of the fiscal year 1933.

I note that during the debate of yesterday in the House it was suggested that the new estate tax rates will yield for a full year between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000. This estimate obviously between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000. This estimate obviously was based upon returns for estates filed in the calendar year 1930. Estate-tax returns filed during the calendar year 1930 cover for the most part estates of decedents who died during the calendar year 1929. Estates are valued as of the date of death. It is well the most part estates of decedents who died during the calendar year 1929. Estates are valued as of the date of death. It is well known that values during most of 1929 were grossly inflated. Any estimate based on 1930 returns, therefore, reflects grossly inflated values and can not in the very nature of things represent a fair basis on which to forecast future returns.

Stocks and bonds ordinarily constitute a large proportion of the larger estates. The standard statistics index of more than 400 selected stocks averaged about 190 during the calendar year 1929. This same index at the present time stands at about 60, representing a decline of about two-thirds. Nothing could indicate more clearly the fallacy of basing future estimates of estate-tax yields on 1930 returns, which represent 1929 values.

In making estimates of the yield from estate taxes during the fiscal year 1933-34 we are bound to take into consideration values and prices likely to prevail during the last six months of the calendar year 1932, as well as the first six months of the calendar year 1932. Our estimate of $135,000,000, while taking into consideration the present low level of values and prices, does make adequate allowance for improvement during those periods. Furthermore, owing to the period over which postponement of payments is possible and likely in view of the difficulties attending the settlement of estates under existing conditions, property values as in the fiscal year 1932-33 will not only affect collections in the fiscal year 1933-34 but will be reflected in collections even beyond that year. fiscal year 1933-84 but will be reflected in collections even beyond that year.

The important fact to be noted in connection with the revenue The important fact to be noted in connection with the revenue bill now pending before the House and intended to furnish ade-quate revenue for the fiscal year 1933 is that increased estate-tax rates can not be made effective in time to have any real influence on 1933 revenues.

Sincerely yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS, Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WILLIS C. HAWLEY, House of Rpresentatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any member of the committee opposed to the bill? If not, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor largely to gain some information, part of which has already been furnished by the gentleman from New Mexico.

There is an adverse report by the Commissioner of the General Land Office against this bill. He concludes his memorandum to the Secretary of the Interior, dated January 18 of this year, in the following language:

It has not been the policy of the department to recommend further grants of lands to the States for specific purposes, except in case of some special or urgent need for such grant.

His memorandum also shows that the Government has been more generous in the granting of public lands to the Territory and State of New Mexico than in any other instance. We have up to the present moment, without regard to this further grant, conveyed to New Mexico, while a Territory or State, 12,000,000 acres. The gentleman says that of this 12,400,000 acres the State has only disposed of 100,000.

Mr. CHAVEZ. In the way of sale.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the way of sale, because the lands can not be disposed of under the statutory limitation of price fixed by the constitution.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. At first glance one would think that the fact we have 12,000,000 acres when some other States only have 8,000,000 would prove that we were getting more; but it does not prove that we are getting more, for the reason that possibly 1,000 acres in Montana or Wyoming are more valuable than 50,000 acres in our State. Values are not measured by acreage.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the fact that there have been some valuable sectional lands granted to New Mexico, more than there have been to some of the other States.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The State of New Mexico is not as barren as the Great Desert of Nevada.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Well, we are pretty barren in places.

Mr. STAFFORD. In some places, but not quite as arid as the State of Nevada.

Mr. CHAVEZ. But under our constitutional limitation a cow man could not buy land at $3 an acre and get by at all. That is impossible, and anyone who knows anything about conditions in the West knows you can not buy certain lands at $3 an acre and make a living.

Mr. STAFFORD. The commissioner goes on to say:

In addition to these grants, a further grant of 250,000 acres was made by the act of Congress approved May 23, 1928, in aid of said railroad bond fund, making in all more than 12,650,000 acres granted to New Mexico for educational and other purposes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now I wish to direct this inquiry. Of course, we are all sympathetic with the purpose of having our public lands used for school purposes. How much of the public lands that have been previously granted to New Mexico are being used for that purpose?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that out of the trust created by those grants New Mexico gets something like $1,500,000 a year for school purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How do they receive that $1,500,000? Mr. CHAVEZ. The gentleman means through what process?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. They lease the lands, and the rental from those lands goes for school purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they lease the land for grazing purposes?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mainly for grazing purposes. I should say that 98 per cent is leased for grazing purposes alone.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the character of the land purposed to be conveyed to New Mexico under this act?

Mr. CHAVEZ. This is what is referred to as a floating grant; that is, you can not get all the acreage in one block. The process would be as follows: If this bill were to become a law the New Mexico land authorities would select some land and make a request on the General Land Office in Washington. The General Land Office would then clear-list this land and say whether or not it would come within the purview of this law. We can not say we want this particular piece. We may go there and, due to the character of the land, say we want this section and that section and that Then that request is submitted to the General Land Office and they clear-list it if it comes within the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice this bill delimits all mineral land from its operations.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is any of the proposed land capable of being included in reclamation projects?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Not in any reclamation project, not an acre, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to know how they arrive at 76.667 acres?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a very pertinent inquiry.

The gentleman says this is a floating grant. How does the State of New Mexico arrive at the specific number of acres that are desired in addition to the 12,000,000 they already have?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Those figures bothered me a little bit at first, so I wanted to know the reason why. I inquired of the Senator who introduced the original bill, and I was advised that those figures were only put in there for this purpose-it could have been 80,000 or 75,000-

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me it would have been better to say 70,000 acres. There must be something back of it.
Mr. CHAVEZ. No. These figures, together with what we already have for this particular school, would bring this school on even terms with our other two normal schools.

Mr. SNELL. Making 250,000 acres for the support of this school?

Mr. CHAVEZ. No; 30,000 acres plus what is provided in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the gentleman, the total income of the State of New Mexico for this purpose is about $1.500,000.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Something like that.

Mr. SNELL. I can not understand how that amount of money can be received by the State of New Mexico when, as I understood the gentleman, these lands are leased for 3 cents an acre for grazing purposes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Of course, a lot of these lands, in certain sections of the State, are leased for oil purposes. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if New Mexico were allowed to develop its oil industry the way it should, we would not be asking for a meager $2,000 or $3,000 a year, as we would get under this bill, and for this reason: We have one particular oil field in the eastern section of the State which has a potential proven capacity of over 1,000,000 barrels daily. Much of that is in Government lands and some in State lands.

Mr. SNELL. But that has nothing to do with this bill?

Mr. CHAVEZ. No. But we could get more revenue if we were allowed to do that than we will get under the present

Mr. SNELL. I can not understand how the State gets an income of $1,500,000 at 3 cents an acre.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think I told the gentleman heretofore that we are leasing some for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. This is all nonmineral land?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes; it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is only another instance where the National Government is being called upon to dispose of some of its property, not for the benefit of the people of the United States but for the benefit of an individual State. We adopted the policy when we granted statehood to New Mexico of giving it certain sections of land for school purposes. Under the enabling act we gave to New Mexico as much land as we gave to any other State.

This land has value. You are asking the National Government to give up something of value for the support of the school system of the State of New Mexico. It is on a par as if we had a bill here asking the National Government to contribute a certain amount of money out of the Treasury of the United States for the support of the school systems of the respective States.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin know that there is a proposal before Congress now by which we will get all of the public domain and not simply 70,000 acres?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a proposal recommended by a commission, but it has not been acted upon by Congress. The public lands not disposed of are the property of the people of the United States.

Mr. CHAVEZ. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin understand that the public policy involved here means the advancement and education of intelligent people in this country which will be beneficial to the country at large, I am sure?

Mr. STAFFORD. New Mexico has taken a counter policy to that which my own State took; and I wish to compliment the Legislature of New Mexico in taking the advanced stand which the people of Wisconsin did not take in holding the land that the Government of the United States gave to the State upon its admission to statehood, and which lands were sold years back at a very nominal price with little returns for the benefit of education. They were valuable timberlands

New Mexico is going to profit by this policy, and I rather commend the Legislature of New Mexico, and am inclined to withdraw my opposition to this bill because the legislature places a definite, fixed value on the land so that it can not become the prey of timber exploiters at the present time, and will ultimately redound to the benefit of the school system.

There was abuse so far as Wisconsin is concerned, and I can only speak of my own State, in the early years, and the valuable timber lands that were granted to the State with a trust impressed upon them that they should be used for school and university purposes were sold for a mere song and were subjected to the speculation of timber interests. The State suffered in not receiving the revenue that it should have received by holding the school lands for present-day use to educate our people, not only to-day but in the future.

I am going to withdraw my opposition to this bill because of one fact, and one fact alone, that the State of New Mexico has placed a limit of value at which these lands can be sold, knowing that limit is not capable of being reached to-day but that future generations will get the benefit that Congress intended in the transfer of these lands for school purposes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a word about this bill. Two years or so ago the President of the United States recommended that the unreserved and nonmineral public lands be turned over to the several States. After a fight in the House we got through a bill appropriating $50,000 to make a survey and a report upon this question. Ex-Secretary Garfield and others were appointed upon this commission, and the committee made its report, recommending that we turn over all these lands to the States. The bill is now pending before us, and here comes a bill providing that we shall turn over 30,000 acres to the State of New Mexico. If the administration at present wants to turn them all over to the States, why not turn over this tract of 30,000 acres while we are determining whether we shall turn all these lands over to the States? I think the bill should be passed.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Parker of Georgia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1590) granting certain public lands to the State of New Mexico for the use and benefit of the Eastern New Mexico Normal School, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Evans of Montana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

POLICE JURISDICTION OVER BLACKFEET HIGHWAY, MONTANA

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8914) to accept the grant by the State of Montana of concurrent police jurisdiction over the rights of way of the Blackfeet Highway, and over the rights of way of its connections with the Glacier National Park road system on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in the State of Montana.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8914, with Mr. PARKER of Georgia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, this bill is designed to concede to the Federal Government jurisdiction over a road running through the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, a road that enters the Glacier National Park at one point, runs through the Indian reservation and again enters the park.

The topography of the country is such that the road can not be run wholly within the park, because of the mountainous conditions. Therefore, it must run outside the park for a distance and on the Indian reservation.

There is really no police protection for that road or for travelers upon the road after they leave the park until they again enter the park. The State of Montana has asked that the Government of the United States assume the control over it as it runs through the Indian reservation.

I know of no objection to the bill except a seeming constitutional objection to the Government of the United States taking jurisdiction over a matter of this kind.

I now yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Leavitt], the author of the bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Evans] has quite thoroughly stated the case. In 1910 the Glacier National Park was established and taken under administration. It was necessary to construct highways to and through the park. On the eastern side of the Glacier National Park lies the Blackfeet Reservation. There is no land touching the park on the east that is not within the Blackfeet Reservation.

The first highway built in 1910, from the park station to Glacier National Park, was constructed by a private railroad company and turned over to the jurisdiction of the National Park Service.

the highway, but as years went by it became necessary to build a much better road to take care of the travel through the park.

That reconstruction was brought about under the Federal highway act. The road between the Glacier National Park station and the Canadian border was built as a part of the 7 per cent system in Montana. It has been necessary to change its location to some extent, and the question arose whether the old jurisdiction of the Park Service extended over the road as reconstructed. It was the opinion of the solicitor of the department that this road, having become a State road under the Federal law, could not be taken under the jurisdiction of the Park Service without the consent of the Legislature of Montana.

In 1929, in order to meet that situation, the Legislature of Montana passed an act which conferred on the Federal Government joint jurisdiction over the road. The purpose of this bill is the protection of the public who visit the Glacier National Park

It must be remembered that this road is in a part of the State of Montana that is entirely uninhabited, with the exception of a few scattered Indian families who have allotments in that section. It is used mostly in connection with travel to and in the national park. There is no policing over this highway, and there can be none except that which is given by the Park Service. People go to the Glacier National Park from all parts of the United States and from all parts of the world. That travel is continually increasing. This road could not be built within the boundaries of the Glacier National Park in most of its mileage because of the contour of the country. It was necessary to go outside the boundaries of the park and run through the Indian reservation. It has leading out from the trunk road itself feeder roads that lead into the national park in three or four different places. We are now completing the construction of a transmountain highway that will cross through Glacier National Park by way of Logan Pass, and that will greatly multiply travel into Glacier National Park. The people of the United States and of the world visiting the Glacier National Park are entitled to protection on the road. That can not be given to them except by the enactment of this legislation. This legislation will not cost the Government of the United States one cent more than it spends now. In order to police the highways within the park it now is necessary for the motor-cycle police, generally consisting of only one man and sometimes in the rush season of two, to travel over the entire length of this road, so that it will take no more men than now are used and necessary.

But they have no direct jurisdiction at the present time except that they can stop a man who is speeding or driving in a dangerous way and admonish him. They have no authority to do anything beyond that on the great proportion of the road that is outside of the park itself.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. How much use is made of this highway by the public?

Mr. LEAVITT. A great deal of use. During the park season of about three months probably 50,000 to 60,000 people would travel over this highway.

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the length of this portion?

Mr. LEAVITT. The length outside of the national park is about 60 miles. The distance between Glacier Park and the entrance to Canada is 52 or 54 miles, and these spurs that lead into the various places of interest within the park vary in length from 13 to 2 miles, with probably half of that mileage outside of the park.

Mr. BRIGGS. And this imposes no obligation upon the Federal Government except that of policing the highway?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is all, and that is all of the authority given in this act. It is intended only to protect the people who visit the national park by putting an end to speeding and improper driving. One life has been lost on

The National Park Service has always had jurisdiction of [ that highway up to the present time, and five or six rather serious accidents have occurred, without any police authority to control the situation and no valid reason to expect that the State of Montana should establish a motor-cycle protection of that particular piece of road. The State of Montana has no such system on any of its roads. Montana is tremendous in area and very small in population, and has never established a State police system to control travel on its highways. But here is a place of congested travel where that kind of protection is necessary, and where it can only be had through the enactment of this legislation, accepting the grant by the State of Montana of concurrent jurisdiction. Concurrent jurisdiction is suggested because the tourist season extends for only three months of the year, and through the remainder of the year the park tourist travel is not going over that part of that particular road. It should at other times have the same jurisdiction as any other road on an Indian reservation or any other place in Montana. During the tourist season the protection of people in life and limb requires the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill, if no member of the committee is opposed to the vital principle involved in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. None that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, were it not that the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress had similar legislation before it for consideration, involving the policing of the highway from the Key Bridge to Fort Myer, perhaps I would not be so strongly opposed to the principle involved herein. A very efficient and capable representative then representing the Virginia district across the Potomac, Mr. R. Walton Moore, strongly urged that the National Government should take over jurisdiction of policing the highway leading through the villages on the other side of the bridge to Fort Myer and beyond. It involved a constitutional question of most vital importance, considering the polity that should exist between the National Government and the State governments. Mr. Moore, reared upon the principle of State rights, that a State should not confer any of its sovereignty upon the National Government, was willing to have the National Government interpose its police power on that highway to the extent of punishing all offenses that might be committed there at any time.

I do not know of another instance in the history of the Government where the National Government has been asked by a sovereign State to take jurisdiction over highways exclusively outside of our national parks and other Government reservations.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. This is not such a case as the gentleman suggests. This is a case in which the Federal Government asked the State to pass an act conferring concurrent jurisdiction upon the National Park Service in order that it might give protection to the people visiting that park.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood from a reading of the bill that the State of Montana has already voted to confer jurisdiction upon the National Government over offenses committed on this highway.

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes. That was done by the State legislature in 1929; but at the suggestion of the Federal Government, in order that the Federal Government, which has its police force there, may protect it properly, this bill was proposed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether at the suggestion of the National Government, it does not infringe upon the statement I made that never before in the history of this Government have we, with consent or without consent, assumed police jurisdiction of highways outside of Government reservations.

Mr. LEAVITT. This is on an Indian reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. The enabling act here does not state that this policing shall be limited only as long as this highway is within an Indian reservation.

Mr. LEAVITT. And it should not be so limited.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Montana goes to the very limit of surrendering all State authority and making the appeal in mendicant fashion, that they are not able, the great State of Montana is not able, to properly police its roads, but must call upon the National Government to do that which is essentially a State function.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. The statement has been made that Montana is approaching the Federal Government in mendicant fashion, asking this. The State is not doing anything like that. The State has passed an act of its legislature conferring this concurrent jurisdiction, at the request of the Park Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. The State of Montana is surrendering its jurisdiction to the National Government, over essential police powers, over a highway that may ultimately be a public highway outside, and having no connection whatsoever with any national reservation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. The State of Montana nowhere within its boundaries has a police force on its highways

Mr. STAFFORD. If it has not, then it should have, and the State of Montana is calling upon the National Government to do that which the State should do.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman please allow me to complete my statement? The gentleman surely would not suggest that the State of Montana should go to one 60 miles of road and establish a police force to take care of the travel that is almost entirely due to the existence of a national park, when it is not able to do it anywhere else in the State?

Mr. STAFFORD. That argument shows the vice of the very principle involved in this bill. If we do it here, we will be called upon to do it in every instance where a highway leads into some kind of reservation. We will be called upon to do it, for instance, on Sheridan Drive, in Illinois, leading up to Fort Sheridan, and the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, because it might be claimed that most of the traffic on that highway is occasioned by going to the respective institutions. That is the vice of this precedent that is being established here, and I now call upon the gentleman, with all his erudition, to cite a concrete case where before in the history of the Government we have ever assumed police jurisdiction over highways outside of our reservations.

Mr. LEAVITT. I can not give any other case where so much of the road is outside of the boundaries of a national park, of course, because there is none. But at the same time when the Rocky Mountain National Park was created in Colorado it had crossing it numerous roads built by counties and by the State, and the State of Colorado conferred jurisdiction upon the Federal Government for that very purpose. It happened that those were within the boundaries of the park, but jurisdiction was entirely under the State.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not a comparable case. That is the same as where the States have deeded property for national soldiers' homes, as in my home city. It is a wellestablished policy that the State surrenders all jurisdiction over that reservation to the National Government. Has the gentleman any other instance comparable to this? I take issue that there is any case in the history of the Government where we have done what we are attempting to do here for the first time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Since 1910 this road in its first and present location has been operated and maintained by the Federal Government as a part of the highway system of the Glacier National Park. It merely happens that in the running of the boundary line the contour of the country was such that the highway could not be constructed entirely within the National Park, which was not mentioned, the Legislature of boundaries. It is in every way a part of the highway system of the Glacier National Park.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; operated and maintained by the National Government, our national highway system. It is but an easy step for the National Government to take jurisdiction over all publicly aided highways, because the National Government has contributed to the maintenance and operation. There is no well-defined difference between the gentleman's case and that which I have cited. It is only one of degree.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman left out a part of my statement. I said "operated and maintained by the Federal Government as a part of the highway system of the Glacier National Park." The gentleman left out the last part of the

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. There are others similarly situated. Roads lead into the Yosemite National Park, but the National Government has not policed those highways. It is policed, and properly so, by the State of California. The State of California is not a mendicant.

Mr. LEAVITT. No; and neither is the State of Montana. Mr. STAFFORD. The State of California is profiting by the large numbers that enter the Yosemite National Park. but the State of Montana is not willing to do its proper share in the receiving of large support by tourists that go to that State, but they say, "No; we will ditch upon the National Government all the liabilities that we can, even though they properly belong to the State government."

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, the gentleman's statement seems unfair.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not want to make an unfair statement to the State of Montana. But I do say-and the gentleman will not challenge this statement—that the State of Montana is trying to transfer a duty which properly belongs to it to the National Government.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman contend that on an Indian reservation, without any white settlement in that section, it is the duty of the State of Montana to put on motorcycle police to patrol the only road that would be patrolled on that reservation or elsewhere?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman refers to an Indian reservation. How long is it going to be an Indian reservation? We are providing for all time.

Mr. LEAVITT. It will be an Indian reservation for many vears.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will be only a question of time-I will not be here, but the gentleman from Montana will probably be-before the gentleman from Montana will be seeking to have that Indian reservation opened to private settlement.

Mr. LEAVITT. No; I will not. That will never be done by any bill introduced by me, for it belongs to the Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let that be as it may. I do not profess to be a constitutional lawyer, but I have given some study to constitutional subjects. I remember that when I first entered upon the study of the law my preceptor, who was later a member of the court, suggested that there was no need of giving close study to constitutional questions, because I would not have occasion to use them for 20 years. Well, I subsequently attended a law school, where I did study constitutional law as well as it could be studied, and I have naturally given some consideration to constitutional questions since. The section involved in the subject before us is clause 17 of section 8 of Article I. I will read it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question before he reads the Constitution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I want to say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that probably his experience has not put him in a position where he could find out what the Department of the Interior does and how the members of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives badger these States in an effort to compel them to do the very thing about which the gentleman is complaining. In connection with the Rocky Mountain National Park, which was mentioned, and the Mesa Verde the State of Colorado, year after year, from 1915 to 1929, was requested to give up its sovereignty. For 14 years they resisted that request, but in 1929 the demand was made in connection with all of the appropriations dealing with the national parks, and the Legislature of Colorado of 1929 did yield and do the thing the gentleman complains of; that is, they permitted the United States, upon the demand of the Department of the Interior, to have the United States officials police the roads and the entrances as well as the inside of the national parks. I am sure the gentleman never heard of it before. I am sure that if he had heard the chairman of the subcommittee last year, in the Seventy-first Congress, talk about these very things he would not take the position he is taking here to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not at all surprised that the heads of bureaus wish to increase their authority. I wish to say to the gentleman that I have learned that the natural propensity of bureau chiefs and bureau officers is to increase their authority. I learned that more than 25 years ago, when the gentleman was in swaddling clothes as compared to service in the House of Representatives. That was one of the first lessons I learned in my legislative work, that every head of a bureau and every head of a department wants to magnify the importance of his work, and Congress has the problem always to try to keep them within their proper spheres. Now, after giving that kind and considerate reply to my friend from Colorado, I will proceed to read the provision of the Constitution which I think is applicable in this case. You will notice, gentlemen, that the bill under consideration-and I am speaking very emphatically about this-I do not want to weary the House, and wish to assure the Members that we are going to finish the Calendar this afternoon in an expeditious way-provides for concurrent police jurisdiction over these highways. I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly the attention of the constitutional lawyers of the House, to clause 17 of section 8 of Article I. It is the applicable clause.

To exercise exclusive-

Not concurrent-

legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District-

That is, the District of Columbia-

(not exceding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, and arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings.

I bottom my position in opposition to this bill upon the fact that there is nothing in the Constitution which grants to the Congress the right to accept from a State concurrent jurisdiction over any property that is not otherwise designated in this section.

There is a reason why the framers of the Constitution made this exclusive jurisdiction as to the designated places, and there is reason also in recognition of the existing polity that was then very sacred to the framers of the Constitution and the founders of the Government, that certain jurisdiction properly belonged to the States and other jurisdiction properly belonged to the National Government. In every instance in the history of our Government, where the people have gone awry on this fundamental principle of transferring to the National Government jurisdiction over matters which are essentially of State concern, the consequences have been detrimental to efficient government.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. YON. In connection with this question, the road is built in a location available for the use of people that want to go to the parks, but it happens to be on a Government reservation in that it is an Indian reserve. Does not the gentleman think the Constitution would apply there?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman, in all frankness, that I am not opposing this bill with nearly the degree of opposition that I would have opposed the proposal to establish a national park in marsh land down at the southern end of Florida—

Mr. YON. We are not discussing that proposition now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because the main purpose of that bill was to spend money for the building of roads through that marsh and along the seacoast for the pleasure seekers of the country at the expense of the National Government.

I can not yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. The gentleman from Wisconsin recognizes the fact that the Constitution of the United States is a grant of power by the States to the Federal Government, and the provision there specifies what power the Federal Government shall have. Here is an instance where a State expressly consents that there shall be concurrent jurisdiction. Can there be any objection to that under the Constitution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; because it violates the fundamental principle of the Constitution that that which belongs to the States shall be held by the States, and that which belongs to the National Government shall be held by the National Government.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. The State here expressly consents through its legislature and offers this jurisdiction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but jurisdiction outside of expressed limitations of the Constitution can not be conferred by mere legislative dictum. The legislature of a State could not confer upon the Federal courts jurisdiction over crimes committed outside of Government reservations, even with the assent of Congress, because such a grant of power is not within the scope of the National Government under the Constitution. I have now set forth the basis of my objection.

I reserve the balance of my time, and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Collins].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the enactment of this bill. I am not opposed to the purpose desired by the committee reporting it. I am opposed to the enactment of this type of class legislation because of the consequences that will follow.

The Park Service lands are near this highway. The Park Service lands are rugged and the building of a road through these lands was difficult, with the result that the road was built through a near-by Indian reservation. The Park Service has its court, the State of Montana has its courts, and a crime of any kind committed on this highway, which is in the Indian reservation, is triable in the courts of the State of Montana. This bill undertakes to give to the Federal court the right to try offenses that are committed on this highway, which is not within the Federal jurisdiction.

If a State can transfer jurisdiction over offenses committed within its boundaries from its State courts to the Federal courts, and the Congress in turn can assume jurisdiction of offenses committed wholly within the jurisdiction of the State, the consequence will be that in time every crime triable in State courts can ultimately be transferred to Federal courts and State courts will disappear.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. No; not now.

Eqorts to pass legislation of this type have been made in this House before. I refer to the antilynching bill. This legislation is of the same type. There is just as much constitutional authority to transfer jurisdiction in the one case as the other. I want to warn you that when you attempt to transfer to the Federal courts authority to try cases in the Federal courts involving crimes committed wholly within the jurisdiction of the State, you are attempting to barter away a power that under the Constitution I am convinced belongs exclusively to the States. Hence, when this bill came on the floor of the House on the Consent Calendar I objected to it.

I feel that the Park Service ought to be helped, if it can be helped. Under existing circumstances these cases can be tried now in the State courts, and the distance to the nearest State court is very little longer than the distance to the | ice, but it can not be built within the boundaries of the district Federal court.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. SWING. If this should be undertaken to be availed of as a preference, of course, there would have to be an act of your State legislature consenting to it.

Mr. COLLINS. No: I do not concede that the States have the right by legislative enactment to transfer to the Federal courts jurisdiction that the Constitution of the United States imposes solely upon them.

I am not objecting to this bill because it affects one section. I objected to a similar bill transferring jurisdiction over offenses committed on the highway that runs from Washington to Fort Myer because the same question was involved there.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. If the acts are committed on the Indian reservation, the Federal law applies and the Federal court would have jurisdiction. This road runs entirely through the Indian reservation and it does not change the jurisdiction.

Mr. COLLINS. The jurisdiction now is in the State court. The Director of the Park Service told me a few minutes ago that offenses committed on this highway are triable in State courts.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, if I thought there was any possibility of any such result, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, I would not be presenting this bill here.

Here is a case where the government of the State has been turned over to the Federal Government for supervision and control of the road within certain limits. this bill does in effect is to establish concurrent police jurisdiction over the right of way over which the road runs, and which is really a part of the Glacier Park highway system. It says that so far as the protection of the public is concerned it shall be under the same rules and regulations as the area within the national park which is served by this highway. That is all there is to it.

There is in it no jurisdiction, except over speeding and reckless driving. It has nothing to do with general jurisdiction over criminals. It only allows the jurisdiction of the Park Service to be extended over the right of way for the protection of the traveling public. This is in reality a part of the highway system of the national park.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.
Mr. COLLINS. The way this ought to be handled is to get a bill through Congress transferring this road to the national park. Then the Federal courts will have jurisdiction of offenses committed on it.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is probably true, but the road runs over an Indian reservation.

Mr. COLLINS. The suggestion I made to the gentleman is the proper way to handle the matter. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] introduced a bill and it is now the law making the road from Corinth, Miss., to Shiloh National Park a part of the Shiloh National Park. You could do the same in this instance.

Mr. LEAVITT. You could not do it immediately, for the reason that the Indians would have to consent to have the transfer of the jurisdiction. Without their consent, I would not ask for it. If there ever comes a time when the Indians are willing to have it done, that would, of course, be a happy solution. Meanwhile this bill merely gives jurisdiction, police control, over speeding and reckless driving on the highway used by the people of the United States. for their protection. It is not for the benefit of the Park Service or for the State of Montana. It is for the benefit of the people of the whole country who travel there. If the contour of the land were such that a road could be constructed with the boundaries of the park, it would then be under the jurisdiction completely of the Park Servpark, because the country is too rough. So, with a general agreement on the part of the State and at the request of the Federal Government, through the Park Service, this bill proposes to accept the grant given by the State of Montana of concurrent police jurisdiction on the highway.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legisgranting to the United States of Montana, approved February 27, 1929, granting to the United States concurrent police jurisdiction over and within all the territory which is now or may hereafter be included in the rights of way of the Blackfeet Highway, including the highway itself throughout its length between Glacier Park Station and the Canadian boundary line, and including also the rights of way of the highways on the Blackfeet Indian the rights of way of the highways on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation connecting the Blackfeet Highway with the Glacier Reservation connecting the Blackfeet Highway with the Glacier National Park road system, including the highways themselves, are hereby accepted, and the laws and regulations of the United States relating to and while in force within the Glacier National Park, so far as applicable, are hereby extended over and within the territory of said rights of ways and highways.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior shall notify in writing the Governor of the State of Montana of the passage and approval of this act, and so far as the interests of the United States shall require the said Secretary shall exercise administrative control and jurisdiction over said rights of way and highways through the National Park Service.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARKER of Georgia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8914 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANTING SAN DIEGO, CALIF., CERTAIN INDIAN LANDS

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 10495, amending an act of Congress approved February 28, 1919 (40 Stat. L. 1206), granting the city of San Diego certain lands in the Cleveland National Forest and the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation of water, and for other purposes, so as to include additional lands, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. PARKER, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10495, with Mr. PARKER of Georgia in the chair.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I am advised that this bill is an emergency matter for the purpose of securing water for one of the cities on the Pacific coast. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing!, the author of the bill, to make a statement in respect to the

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, in 1919 Congress passed an act transferring the title to 1,940 acres of land to the city of San Diego to build a reservoir for which the city was to pay a price determined by a condemnation suit. The proceedings under that act have all been complied with, and the city was ready to build the dam when it found that the amount of land which it had asked for in 1919 was not quite sufficient to take care of the reservoir that they now plan to provide water required for the increased population of the city of San Diego. Nine hundred and twenty additional acres will be needed. Therefore, they come back to Congress and ask permission to purchase these additional 920 acres at the same price they paid for the other and have it included in the reservoir site with what they purchased in 1919. The city is ready to let the contract. It will aid in the effort to relieve unemployment in that part of the country. The water is badly needed for the increased population of the city. There are provisions in the bill that have been requested by the Government in the interest of the Indians, which have been agreed to by the city and approved by the committee. I sincerely trust that the bill will be passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Montana yield me 15 minutes?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is rather involved. I wish to make some inquiry to rather remove some doubts I have about the bill. Back in 1919 we granted to the city of San Diego certain flowage rights in this Indian reservation in consideration that they would pay for the 1.940 acres the sum of $75,000, and in addition thereto that they would pay the award that would be determined by the Secretary of the Interior for damages that the Indians might suffer by reason of the removal of their homes from these inundated lands, which amounted, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, to $286,428, or a total for land and damages of $361,428. By this bill you are seeking to secure additional land because it is the desire of the city of San Diego to raise the crest of the dam some 20 or 27 feet, which will take an additional 920 acres. For these 920 acres you are paying nearly the same rate that you paid for 1,940 acres, but you are not making any provision whatsoever for any damages the Indians may suffer by reason of the inundation of this land, as you did in the other case. Why?

Mr. SWING. The reason is obvious.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not obvious from the report. I read every line of it, almost until midnight last night.

Mr. SWING. Under the original act the Secretary of the Interior figured out very generously what it would cost to move each of these 127 Indians, put them on other pieces of ground, build them new homes, build them barns, give them fences, and all other equipment necessary, and establish them completely anew. That was all taken care of in the figure which was estimated by the Secretary, and which has been paid by the city of San Diego. Of course, it is not necessary to again pay for the moving of these same 127 Indians. They are the same 127 to-day that they were in 1919. The money is in the hands of the Secretary to move them, and he said then, and he says now, that that is ample to move them and rehabilitate them on new and better ground than they are on at the present time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman personally acquainted with this territory?

Mr. SWING. I am; yes. I have been on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman contend that there are no habitations on these additional 920 acres which will be required by reason of increasing the height of the dam?

Mr. SWING. The Secretary in his estimates under the 1919 act has contemplated the removal of all the Indians, and included the cost of removing all in his original estimate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman also inform the committee as to the securing of water rights to those Indians, if this bill is enacted, which takes away their water rights on their present reservation?

Mr. SWING. The water rights of the Indians as they were before the act of 1919, before there was any encroachment upon their land, will be preserved for them after this act is passed. If they stay upon the remainder of this reservation, they will have leave to utilize and develop such water as they had the right to use before the act of 1919 was enacted. If they should elect to go some place else, and the Government buy for them new lands within the drainage area of the San Diego River, they are accorded under this bill the right to transfer whatever rights they now have to the new lands to which they might be removed.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the water rights of the Indians on the new lands are amply protected under the provisions of the present bill?

Mr. SWING. Two attorneys for the Indian Bureau gave that their serious consideration and so testified before the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, may I have the attention of the chairman of the committee? I was rather misled last evening when I was studying this bill by the bracketing of the bill so as to give information to the House in conformance to the so-called Ramseyer rule.

I direct the gentleman's attention to page 7, where there is bracketed all language from the first line down to the end. I gleaned from that, when I was reading the report—and it is my rule usually to read the report before I read the bill—and that language was all eliminated from the bill, whereas, upon examination of the bill, I find that it is all incorporated. I did not wish to raise a point of order against the bill, as I might have done, in not complying with the Ramseyer rule, because it does not. Will some one acquaint me at least with the purpose of putting in brackets matter that is virtually incorporated in the bill under consideration?

Mr. SWING. As the gentleman knows, the Ramseyer rule is not entirely capable of self-execution. It reads:

Do it one way or the other, so that the changes are indicated.

All of the subject matter within brackets is new matter which is added to the old act. Not being able to write in italics myself, I put in brackets the new language, and on the margin of the copy I wrote "put in italics the language within brackets." The printer saw fit to exercise his discretion, which he frequently exercises, and printed the new language in brackets.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the fault of the typographical devil, then, rather than the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. I do not like to blame them, because sometimes they save us from ourselves, but all within brackets is new language added to the act of 1919 by way of amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the first time I have known the Public Printer to receive blame for not properly acquainting the House with the information—

Mr. SWING. I want to compliment the printers. Many times they save us from grammatical errors, wrong quotations, dates, and so on.

Mr. STAFFORD. I realize the gentleman is a candidate for the United States Senate and is indulging in every opportunity to pay compliments.

Mr. SWING. I will even pay the gentleman from Wisconsin a compliment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am glad the gentleman has changed his position as far as I am concerned, and I hope that when he leaves this House he will not include in the character of epithets that he has used in times past, as far as the Representative from the State of Wisconsin is concerned.

Mr. SWING. I am happy to be able to compliment the gentleman from Wisconsin for the many valuable services he has rendered the House and the country during his long service here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1919, granting the city of San Diego certain lands in the Cleveland National Forest and the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation of water and other purposes, be amended to read as follows:

(40 Stat. L. 1206-1209), for the removal of said Indians as a tribe, be available also for reestablishing individually or as a group or groups the Capitan Grande Band of Indians, including those residing within the Conejos Valley of the retained reservation, on tract or tracts of land to be acquired by purchase or otherwise for them, and for the acquiring of water rights including cost of transferring in whole or in part their present water rights to such other lands, construction of necessary water works, including the development of a water supply, for domestic and irrigation purposes, purchasing or building homes, purchasing of household furnishings, farm equipment, livestock, and other improvements for the benefit of these Indians under such rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That those Indians desiring to remain on that part of the Capitan Grande Reservation not disposed of under this act may remain thereon and receive such benefits there."

Vith the following committee amendment:

On page 2, in line 3, after the quotation marks, strike out "That the east half southwest quarter southeast quarter and the south half northeast quarter southeast quarter section 5" and insert the word "That."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Evans of Montana: On page 3, line 18, strike out the word "with" and insert in lieu thereof the word "within". within.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the following committee amendment:

On page 7, insert:
"SEC, 2. Nothing contained in section 1 hereof shall be held, deemed, or construed as affecting, altering, or in any wise changing the rights of the riparian owners under the provisions in the act approved February 28, 1919."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARKER of Georgia, Chairman of the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union. reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10495) amending an act of Congress approved February 28, 1919 (40 Stat. L. 1206), granting the city of San Diego certain lands in the Cleveland National Forest and the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation of water, and for other purposes, so as to include additional lands, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Evans of Montana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INCLUSION OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE COEUR D'ALENE AND ST. JOE NATIONAL FORESTS, STATE OF IDAHO

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands, I call up the bill (H. R. 6659) for the inclusion of certain lands in the Coeur d'Alene and St. Joe National Forests, State of Idaho, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6659) for the inclusion of certain lands in the Coeur d'Alene and St. Joe National Forof Georgia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. French]. such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. I think a brief statement will suffice to explain the provisions of this bill. President Roosevelt emphasized the importance of preserving the national forests of the United States under laws that had been passed by extending forest areas in Idaho and in other States 30 years ago. The pending bill provides for making available for forest-reserve purposes approximately 500,000 acres of land in northern Idaho in the counties of Shoshone, Kootenai, Benewah, and Latah.

Prior to the inclusion of areas in forest reserves adjacent to the areas referred to in this bill the lands herein were permitted, for the most part, to pass into private ownership, in part through grants to the Northern Pacific Railroad aggregating something over 100,000 acres, but for the most part through public land laws, chief of which were the homestead, the timber, and stone and the preemption laws. Most of the entries were made between 30 and 40 years ago. During the last 30 years most of this land has been cut over, the valuable part of the timber has been sold, and now has come a time when the United States, the State of Idaho, and the counties are interested in what is going to be the future of this sizable area.

The land has very little value when the timber has been removed. It is relatively high and rugged and in a region that is subject to frosts, and, therefore, is not fit for successful agricultural purposes other than grazing. The land is not of such value as to justify the owners, in many instances, in retaining it, and the land is beginning to slip back to the counties for nonpayment of taxes.

It is a fire hazard at this time, hazardous to adjacent lands owned by the Federal Government and hazardous to the areas themselves, because whatever new growth of timber is coming on is constantly menaced and threatened by fire.

About 100,000 acres are now public land, the balance, something like 400,000 acres, being the land to which I have just referred as having passed from Government

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman explain this language in the commissioner's report:

This would permit private owners to exchange their lands within the area for an equal value of national forest timber or land in the State, including the public lands within the area.

Mr. FRENCH. I was coming to that in just a moment. Now, what does the bill do? It provides for extending the provisions of the act of March 20, 1922, to this area. In other words, the area is not arbitrarily included within the national forest reserves, except the part that is public land. As to the other area, the provision of the act of March 20, 1922, is extended, under which provision the Federal Government would have the privilege of exchanging lands, either public lands or lands within the national forest, or timber thereon, with the private owners of land in compensation for their land. The exchange would be made upon the basis of actual values. In that way the lands would be acquired by the Federal Government, and as they would be acquired would be included within either the St. Joe or the Cœur d'Alene National Forest. This would bring these two forests together. The lands now are like a wedge in between the two Government-owned forest areas.

Mr. GOSS. Is there any difference in the value of the land which would be exchanged by this transfer?

Mr. FRENCH. Surely; and that is the merit of the act of March 20, 1922. In other words, under that act, as ests, State of Idaho, and for other purposes, with Mr. PARKER | the gentleman will notice, regard is had for the values of the land.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield to me? Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. The owners of these lands, in order to insure fire protection, formed their own fire-protection societies. The burden of providing proper fire protection is very onerous and the purpose of this bill is to transfer the cost of providing protection against fire from the shoulders of the private organizations to the Federal Government.

Mr. FRENCH. That is not the purpose of the bill; no. Mr. COLLINS. But that is the effect?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, in part, for it is receiving almost no protection now-the cut-over land. So long as the land is covered with timber that is valuable, private owners will protect it. But the owners have cut a very large part of the timber. This has been their policy, and as the timber is cut off, the land passes into the same condition that pertains to the cut-over lands in Michigan, Wisconsin. Pennsylvania, and other States where the false policy of many years ago was followed, of stripping the lands of their valuable stands of timber and not providing for reforestation at the same time. We are trying in this bill to stop this wicked waste. We do have fire-protective associations in which you will find private owners, sometimes just individuals and sometimes lumber companies; together with the State because of its ownership of land; together with the Federal Government because of its extensive ownership. The theory is that all should combine in bearing the cost of fire protection.

Mr. COLLINS. And if this bill goes through quite a burden will be lifted from their shoulders and transferred to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FRENCH. To some extent, and with the burden would go certain benefits, and in the great long run enormous benefits.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman has just stated that the lands have no value.

Mr. FRENCH. I would say that the cut-over lands have little value at this time for agricultural purposes. They have some immediate grazing value, but their main value lies in their suitability for new forests that in another 40 or 50 years and beyond will mean merchantable timber, and in their value for holding back the moisture fall for areas below.

Mr. COLLINS. The costs will be shifted to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. FRENCH. In a sense, yes; but unless this be done, there will be little gain for anyone and immense loss for a great section of country for the years to come. Under the laws of the several States the citizens of the State do not feel like exempting lands from taxation, particularly when the lands are owned by companies. Therefore, companies as a rule do not find it profitable to adopt the policy of long-time cutting over a period of forty or fifty or a hundred years, retaining in the area a crop that will come on every year. On the other hand, the Federal Government will not be subject to taxation and is better suited to hold the land for the growing of timber for all purposes through the future years.

This area has produced most valuable timber and will again, and it ought to belong to some agency that can think in terms of the great future and of public welfare.

Mr. BROWNING and Mr. EATON of Colorado rose.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield first to the gentleman from Ten-

Mr. BROWNING. Whom will this timber belong to when it grows there 40 years from now?

Mr. FRENCH. If the land should be acquired by the Government, the timber would belong to the Government and be disposed of as other timber now owned in the national forests.

Mr. COLLINS. Provided the Government buys it.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. In what status will that land be when | this bill is passed? Will the land then belong to the Gov-

Mr. FRENCH. As I said in the earlier part of my remarks, under the bill the public lands will at once become a part of the national forest. As to the other lands that are now privately owned, they will become part of the national forest only as the Government acquires them, and then as the Government acquires the lands they will be included in the national forest.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Is it not just as true to say that for every acre that is taken away and goes into the United States Government under a bill of this sort, the counties and the State lose the taxes from that land?

Mr. FRENCH. That is true. Ultimately, however, as the gentleman well knows, the counties would receive back the 25 and 10 per cent from whatever profits would come from the lands for school and road purposes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. In other words, it is really giving up by the State to the Federal Government control of lands which otherwise would be under their control, and is not a charge upon the Government, but is something that they could get some benefit out of; is not that true?

Mr. FRENCH. That is true. Consider another factor. Some of these lands are going back to counties for nonpayment of taxes. But counties are not able to handle them. Counties should not be asked to set up county forest-administration work to be carried along beside the work of the National Government. The counties would need to dispose of the land in some way, because counties are not organized upon such a basis as to be able to handle forest lands. Ultimately, I have no doubt the lands will go to the State or the Federal Government for forest purposes. I should like to see this done now, so as to save the precious years of time so valuable and necessary in the life of a tree.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. In the public act the gentleman referred to Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed.

That is mandatory. When it refers to timber, does it refer to stumpage, or does it refer to logs, or just what does

Mr. FRENCH. I think if the gentleman will read the act again he will see that the mandate refers to the manner of cutting the timber. The act says the timber "shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations of the Forest Service"; in other words, in passing the law the Congress sought to prevent a lumber company from trading for timber and going in and cutting the little trees and the big treeseverything of value-off a great area and making it look like the abomination of desolation. Rather, the Congress undertook to require that such timberlands be treated as other forest lands are treated under the national forests, the large ripe timber being cut, the new growth being permitted to stand, and in this way to take its place in later years as a merchantable crop.

Mr. GOSS. There is a good deal of difference between the value of the stumpage and the value of the land itself.

Mr. FRENCH. Surely; and the Government may do one of two things: In some places the Government may exchange lands and timber that are public domain or within a national forest for the land it may seek to acquire. Or, again, in most instances, I assume, the Government will trade stumpage and not the land itself.

Mr. GOSS. Yes. But, as I say, there is a good deal of difference between stumpage and the land itself; that is, the stumpage value. Has the gentleman any idea what it will cost the Government to cut out the undergrowth and get ready for cleaning up for second-growth timber, as it would have to be done in the national forests, and the organization for cutting down the timber and having it sold under the terms of the public act?

Mr. FRENCH. We have not reached the stage in the Northwest in the great forest areas that embrace many millions of acres—in the State of Idaho some 27,000 square miles within national forests—we have not reached the time, I say, and perhaps it is a long time off, when it will be possible to keep the area as clean as the public and private woodlands in the East are kept. The Government, however, as timber is cut, ought to have the right to have it cut along the methods provided by the national forests, so that good merchantable timber will be felled, and the rest of the timber prevented from being destroyed.

Mr. GOSS. As I have said, there is a great difference between the stumpage and the actual timber value. There is a great deal of difference of what it would cost the Government in the exchange of stumpage rights, and the actual timberland, and putting it in shape for timber growing. I know something about this, for I have been out in these national forests. It might cost considerable money to clear it off for fire protection and for second-growth timber. If we do it on the basis of exchange of stumpage, that is another thing.

Mr. FRENCH. The Government would not exchange timber with a company and permit it to go in and leave the land with a lot of fallen timber and débris that would be a fire hazard.

Mr. GOSS. Where is there any provision in the bill to stop that?

Mr. FRENCH. The act under which the exchange would be made provides that it shall be cut under such rules and regulations as pertain to the national forests and under the direct supervision in accordance with the requirements of those regulations.

Mr. GOSS. Under regulations of the department you would be required to clear it of brush and that would be more expensive. I am asking the gentleman if he can tell the House what it will cost in making the exchange on a stumpage basis.

Mr. FRENCH. I am sorry to say that I can see no possible basis for a definite answer. The land would need to be appraised, every acre of it; any timber would need to be estimated. At this time there can be no certain figure of

Mr. GOSS. When we receive this land we have to take care of it under the regulations of the department.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. For fire prevention and other things. Surely there must be some past experience that would give us an idea of how much per acre it would cost to clear that land and keep it under the terms of the regulations of the department. What has it cost in the past? How many acres are involved in it?

Mr. FRENCH. With what has been eliminated, something like 500,000 acres.

Mr. GOSS. It will be quite an expense to take care of that after we get it into the national forest preserves, under the terms of the exchange, on either stumpage or exchange of timber, where the act states that we must cut the timber. It is mandatory that it will be given in exchange and shall be cut and removed under the law, and as I say under the law removing and cutting out this underbrush is a tremendously expensive job. In fact, it is dealt with on a purely stumpage basis. If this bill passes, it seems to me that it would cost the Government a large sum of money to accept 500,000 acres under the terms of the exchange.

Mr. FRENCH. I think the gentleman does not quite understand the way in which the Forest Service handles the exchange of timber for lands.

Mr. GOSS. I would be very glad to get an explanation.

Mr. FRENCH. Under the language to which I referred a moment ago, the person who acquires timber in exchange and cuts it must leave the area from which he takes the timber clean, must burn the brush, must handle the removal of timber under forest reserve supervision. That is true under the Federal laws and policies, and it is true under our State laws, and the burden of this work is upon the purchaser of the timber. When it comes down to the precise cost of the exchange, that is a matter that will turn upon close appraisals under a law that has been in force and applied for 10 years. The exchanges provided for in the pending bill would probably require some years of time to consummate.

Mr. GOSS. And there again we come back to the old question of stumpage on the one hand, which is just purely the timber rights, and on the other hand, the actual land with the timber rights, regardless of who cuts it, for it has to be cleared under the regulations, and that will be taken into account in connection with the exchange of property.

Mr. FRENCH. It probably would.

Mr. GOSS. Therefore it seems to me that a tremendous amount of money would have to be appropriated to take care of 500,000 acres. How many thousand feet of timber grow to the acre in Idaho, offhand?

Mr. FRENCH. A great deal of this land, the timber from which has been cut, has produced all the way from two million feet to four million feet board measure to the quarter section. Some areas have little timber, some great stands.

Mr. GOSS. That is quite a bit when you spread it over 500,000 acres.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman overlooks that most of this area is cut-over land, and the land itself does not have great value.

Mr. GOSS. If it has been cut over by private industry, usually they go in and have no regard for the underbrush, for any trees that are left there. They cut off absolutely what they want, and the thing is a bad waste almost to look at it. I have been over lots of this timber land. If it was taken off by private industry, and then you want to make the change without the stumpage, it seems to me it would be an expensive thing to do on such a large amount of land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Idaho has been for many years on the Committee on Appropriations. Will the gentleman tell the committee what the expense per acre is of our national forests?

Mr. FRENCH. I should say for fire protection purposes, which will be the essential expense here, that it would run not over 7 to 10 cents per acre. The cost probably throughout the years would be not over $35,000 to $50,000. I should like my colleague from the adjoining State-Montana-who. before he came to Congress, for years had experience with the Forest Service, to give us his opinion on that point. I have estimated that it would cost for fire protection probably not over 7 to 10 cents per acre.

Mr. LEAVITT. I think that is approximately right. Mr. FRENCH. But in return the Forest Service would receive income from grazing fees and from sale of timber as the years would run along.

Mr. GOSS. What is stumpage worth in Idaho per 1,000

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That would depend upon the character of the timber and the distance from the market.

Mr. GOSS. That is the point.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. And the demand for the lumber. Mr. GOSS. Idaho is a lumbering State and has a great deal of timber of various kinds. Therefore, in these exchanges I am trying to point out to the House that we have no idea of knowing how much money would be involved if you are dealing on the basis of stumpage.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. This bill provides that exchanges shall be made for equal value and not for equal area. The gentleman from Wisconsin has referred several times during my service here with him to the timber frauds in the West, which occurred 25 or 30 years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they were partly perpetrated on this very land by the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; because of the fact that the law provided the exchanges should be on the basis of equal area, but this bill and others enacted during the last 25 years provided for exchanges of equal value.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us get the practical question before the committee as to what the ultimate cost of maintenance of this forest reserve is going to be.

The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. French] states that the cost of fire protection would be in the neighborhood of 10 cents an acre, but what is the other cost for maintenance of | ent.

the forest reserve? As I view this bill, it is sought in this instance to impose some local burdens upon the National Government for the main purpose of conservation. Is it worth while, as far as costs are concerned, to the National Government? That is the question. In Wisconsin we are taking care of our own fire protection on our privately owned lands. By this act it is sought to have the National Government undertake work that properly belongs to the State or to private interests. There are hundreds of thousands of acres included in this tract that belong to railroads or subsidiaries. I want to know just how much benefit is going to be conferred on those private interests, as far as privately owned lands are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. When additional lands are put into an existing national forest, the additional expense of fire protection and the expense of administration amounts to but very little, because in the case of a fire in the forest they have the force there, and they can get control of it much quicker if it is all within the control of the Federal Government than if a part of it is in control of the State. which might not have proper protection afforded, or in the case of private ownership, where they might not have protection.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this case the report shows that this land, under private control, has private protection maintained by themselves. I wish to ask the gentleman from Idaho, who is the sponsor of this bill, whether this bill primarily is to relieve these privately owned lands of the burden of properly conserving their lands as far as fire is concerned and imposing that burden upon the National Government?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, no; that is not the purpose of the bill. Mr. STAFFORD. It will have that incidental effect.

Mr. FRENCH. The Government will take on no duties except as it acquires land. Owners of timberland will continue to share in protecting their own timber. Their cutover lands they are not protecting now. We want them protected.

Mr. STAFFORD. But how about the privately owned lands? Hundreds of thousands of acres are owned by the Northern Pacific Railway. Are we going to come to their relief and assume a burden that they are now assuming themselves?

Mr. FRENCH. May I say that the Northern Pacific has disposed of practically all its holdings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, then, take the Milwaukee interests, the Milwaukee subsidiaries, which bought lands in large quantity up there, running into thousands of acres. How about that private interest, in which I suppose many citizens of my city are interested? I am not in favor of relieving them of some burden that naturally pertains to their proprietary interest and is not national in character.

Mr. FRENCH. Something like 200,000 acres of land belong to companies owning rather sizable areas. I have a memorandum of something like 10 of the concerns which own the largest acreage, the smallest one indicated being a 2,000-acre holding. It is indicated that the sum total is 200,000 acres and that something like 113,000 acres are to-day in merchantable timber, owned by those same concerns.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. I think we should have the full membership of the House here. I make the point of order that there is not a quorum

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. It is quite evident that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman withdraw the point of order for a moment? I think we can come to an understanding

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, there are only 18 Members present and the Delegate from the Philippine Islands. It is a very important question, the matter of taking over a policing of 500,000 acres of land, and I think we should have the full membership present to consider it.

I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is not a quorum pres-the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARKER of Georgia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6659 and had come to no resolution thereon.

APPEAL FOR A RULE ON PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE BILL

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement before the Committee on Rules on the Philippine independence bill:

before the Committee on Rules on the Philippine independence bill:

Mr. Osias. Mr. Chairman, you have listened to the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs [Mr. Harr] and the ranking member of the minority [Mr. Knutson] of the same committee, who stated that the bill before you (H. R. 7233) has merited practically the unanimous approval of the members of their committee. They took up the basic provisions of the bill, and I need not make repetitious arguments.

I am immensely gratified to have been given the privilege to voice the appeal of the people of the Philippine Islands who are anxiously awaiting early action on the bill granting them the independence which America promised and which I trust will be redeemed by this Congress.

During my incumbency in office as a representative of the Philippine Legislature and the Filipino people in the United States I have constantly and consistently made articulate our supreme aspiration for a free and independent life. In Congress and out of Congress I have sought to make our independence stand clear and unequivocal. It is certainly encouraging that both the Senate and the House committees charged with the duty and responsibility to pass upon legislation on Philippine affairs have now favorably reported out bills calculated to remove the present uncertainty of our situation and which is designed more definitely to bring to us the blessings of a self-governing existence.

This clearly is not the occasion for a lengthy discussion of the Philippine question. We are all busy and time is priceless. I shall limit myself to a plea for a rule on this measure, H. R. 7233, in order that the membership of the House may be given an opportunity for discussion, deliberation, and action.

Mr. Chairman, there is presented before you for decision a matter at once grave and momentous. This committee has it in its power to grant or deny action on a problem exceedingly vital to the relations between the peoples of the United States and the Philippine Islands and not without importa ment and fortified by reason.

When you will grant a rule on this independence bill, a grateful people will know that you have acted in a manner befitting the spirit which animated magnanimous America at the incipiency

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move that of your Philippine occupation and that you have been actuated by the same noble purpose which made Washington a towering figure among the great liberators of the world.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 24, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The VICE PRESIDENT. The tariff bill is before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison].

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] is absent in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the object of this legislation is to restore to Congress the power designed by the fathers of laying taxes upon the American people. The bill as it passed the House and the substitute which has been offered in behalf of the minority members of the Finance Committee differ not a great deal. The purposes are the same.

It will be recalled that in 1922 in the Fordney-McCumber Act the Tariff Commission was given the power to increase or reduce rates 50 per cent, Congress withholding, of course, the right to take items that were on the free list and impose any duty upon them or to place on the free list any items that were dutiable. The object of the legislation is to take away from the Tariff Commission that power and to lodge it back with the Congress.

The bill as it passed the House not only does that but it creates in the Tariff Commission the position of a consumer's counsel, designed and intended to represent the consuming public in matters before the Tariff Commission.

Third, the House bill sought to have the President of the United States inaugurate a movement for an international economic conference, the purpose of which was the lowering of excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices and other economic barriers affecting international trade, preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars and promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations,

The House bill sought to do those three things, to restore to Congress the power to fix tariff rates, the holding of an international economic conference, and the creation of the position of consumers' counsel.

The substitute bill which is now being considered by the Senate does not disturb in essentials the bill as it passed the House taking away from the Tariff Commission the right to fix duties. It only clears up some ambiguities and lays down more particularly and definitely what factors shall enter into consideration by the Tariff Commission in ascertaining the difference in cost of production. It proposes to reincorporate the provision of the House bill calling for an international economic conference; it proposes to reincorporate the provision for the creation of a consumers' counsel; and it goes one step further and requests the President to inaugurate proceedings to bring about reciprocal trade agreements.

In passing, Mr. President, permit me to say that whatever the work of the proposed international economic conference may be, whatever trade agreements it may formulate, whatever understandings may be arrived at as to reducing excessive rates or removing trade barriers, a report must be submitted to Congress and action must be taken by Congress before any final result shall be reached. The same thing is true as to the provision that invites the President to undertake to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements for the purpose of bringing about mutual tariff concessions. Whatever agreements may be entered into, they must not merely be reported to the Senate but they must be reported to the American Congress and be ratified and confirmed by the Congress before they shall become effective. That is the legislation we are seeking to enact.

Of course, my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. Warson] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and others, if the speech made by the Senator from Indiana over the radio the other night is to be accepted as an indication of the line of attack on this proposed legislation, will bring up the bugaboo that we are again about to get into the League of Nations; that we are going to allow other countries to fix our tariff duties; and that we are treading on very delicate and dangerous ground. I answer that contention merely by the suggestion that all we seek to do, in order that we may again build up some export trade and commerce, is to create a world sentiment favorable to the reduction of excessive tariff rates and the removal of trade barriers and discriminations, and, in any event, a report must be submitted to Congress.

No one will be deceived by the suggestion advanced by the Senator from Indiana that there might be international complications. Before I shall have finished, Mr. President, I will call to the attention of the Senate the fact that what we propose to do along the line of endeavoring to get some reciprocal trade agreements and mutual tariff concessions is exactly what the Republican Party attempted to do in the Fordney-McCumber law, because as that bill passed the House of Representatives there was a provision in it to that | vision was recommended by the Finance Committee, but Recurring, Mr. President, to the flexible-tariff provision, which is really the milk in the coconut, I desire to say that we are not attempting to do any radical thing, we are not attempting to do any extreme thing with reference to tariff legislation. We are merely trying to formulate a plan which will prove most effectual in the future in working out a tariffrevision program.

The provision in the present law giving to the Tariff Commission the right to increase or lower tariff duties is a new idea. It was never thought of previously to 1922. So far as I have been able to ascertain from my search of the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD, the first proposal that was made to carry out that scheme was in 1922. It was offered at that time, as I shall show, merely as a temporary proposal. No one dreamed that it was to be a permanent feature of our governmental structure; no Senator lifted his voice and said that he was for it as a permanent policy of this Government. Why? Because for 140 years this Government had existed under a constitution giving to Congress the power to fix taxes upon the American people, to levy duties at our customhouses. That plan had worked very well through these years, it was the conception of the founders of the Government, and consequently no one until 1922 had the audacity even to suggest a plan that would take away from the Congress of the United States the power to levy taxes and to fix duties at the customhouses.

I will be pardoned I hope for reviewing the history of that proposal. Senators now within the sound of my voice will recall that the then distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, Mr. Fordney, whom we all admired in his lifetime and whose memory we now respect, a splendid gentleman, was among the highest of all protectionists who ever walked the public stage. He boasted of the fact that a tariff could not be fixed too high for him. Indeed, he almost asserted he would be willing to put a tariff wall around this Government so high that we should live entirely to ourselves with respect to trade and commerce.

So, as a Member of the other House, he conceived the idea in framing that legislation of providing an American valuation scheme, something that had never previously been proposed in this country except once, away back in 1868, as I recall, and it was proposed then because of certain abnormal conditions then existing, Congress repealed it as soon almost as it was passed. However, Mr. Fordney conceived and put through the House the plan of fixing tariff rates on the American valuation plan, the whole idea being to get rates as high as possible. It was a fine scheme for the protectionists, but it was so indefensible that even my good friend from Indiana [Mr. Warson] and the present distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. Smoot] when the bill came over here-and I say it to their credit-would not stand for that proposal. So it was stricken out in the Mc-Cumber end of that legislation.

But what did they do? They struck out the American valuation plan, which sought to increase the rates much above the high figures which were provided in that measure; but because, as they said, there was an exceptional situation in the country, because there were abnormal conditions confronting the world, because the currencies of foreign countries were depreciated and exchange was all out of joint, in order to meet the then extraordinary and abnormal conditions, they decided that they would try out a flexible provision in the law. So they gave the Tariff Commission, which had already been created, the power of increasing to the extent of 50 per cent or reducing to the extent of 50 per cent the duties on goods coming into this country. It was offered as a temporary suggestion, and, as I say, no one argued that it should be a permanent feature of our governmental structure.

To show that that is true, in the discussion of what we are trying to do now, I want to read just briefly from some of the arguments which were then made. The flexible pro-when it reached the floor of the Senate a Republican Senator argued against it and offered an amendment to it to the effect that it should apply for only two years, and the amendment he offered made it operative accordingly.

The author of the amendment was the then distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Bursum. His argument was so strong and forceful, as were the arguments of other Senators against that proposal and in favor of his amendment, that the amendment was adopted by the Senate without any partisan character whatever. The Bursum amendment, which limited the operation of the flexible provision to practically two years, was adopted in this body by a vote of nearly 2 to 1. In looking over the list of distinguished Senators who at that time voted to make the provision operative for only two years, thus putting their stamp of approval on the proposition that it was merely of temporary character, one can not decide whether there were more Republicans or more Democrats who voted for it: indeed, it is my belief that there were on the roll call more Republicans who voted for the Bursum amendment than voted against it. The vote was-yeas 34, nays 19; and in looking over the list of distinguished Senators who now adorn this Chamber and who voted on that roll call I see the name of CAPPER; I see the name of McNary, one of the able leaders on the other side; I see the names of Moses, NORBECK, ODDIE, and SHORTRIDGE. Those Senators who are here now voted at that time. Of course, I know that the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] and other distinguished Senators were at that time in favor of making the flexible provision temporary, but, unfortunately, they did not vote on that particular amendment. There were only 19 votes against that proposal. In arguing the question, this is what Mr. Bursum said:

Mr. Walsh of Montana. What is the date fixed by the Senator in his amendment?

Mr. Bursum. Two years; until December, 1924.
Mr. Walsh of Montana. Would it not suit the Senator a little better if he fixed it the 4th of March, 1925?

Mr. Bursum. No. I have no disposition, in submitting this amendment, to undertake in any way to curtail the prerogatives of any President. The amendment is offered in good faith. My position is that the proposal to delegate this power to the President is a departure and an unusual procedure. It involves a great national issue, an issue which has not been submitted to great national issue, an issue which has not been submitted to the people of this country.

It can only be justified, to my mind, upon the assumption that there is chaos all over the world to-day, that values are upset in all of the countries of the world, that the rates of exchange are erratic, that values are constantly changing, and it may be possible, and is probable, that some of the rates which have been agreed upon by the Senate committee and adopted by the Senate, while they may be fair and just at this time, three months from now cr six months from now may be entirely too high, may be out of all proportion, and upon that theory, and assuming that those are the actual conditions existing in the world to-day, this change might be justified. I think it is justified as an emergency relief which could not be obtained through any other method or through the usual proceedings of legislation.

which could not be obtained through any other method or through the usual proceedings of legislation.

This amendment would limit to two years the time of the extension of the authority granted by the amendments to section 315. If during those two years the experience has proven satisfactory to the country, it will not be difficult for Congress to continue this authority if the country believes it wise and if the Congress agrees to it. It might be said that we can repeal the law if it is not agreeable. I submit that that is putting an unnecessary burden upon Congress, the burden of repealing this authority.

I believe we can trust Congress to reenact this provision if it is in the future found necessary, and if it is not found necessary it will not be reenacted. I have grave doubts personally as to the wisdom of a permanent change of this character. I am of the opinion that Congress is amply able and capable of designating the rates of duty and providing for the raising of revenue; but under the circumstances, under the extraordinary conditions which exist all over the world, the uncertainty of values, the constant changes in every line of industry which affect our imports, for the purpose of serving this vital emergency, the delegation of authority may be justifiable.

Mr. McCumber, who was in charge of the bill as chairman of the Finance Committee at that time, in the discussion

Now I want to say a word upon the other proposition. I agree with the Senator from New Mexico that this is something in the nature of an emergency measure, to meet conditions which may arise in the near future, and before prices become stabilized throughout the world. I would not want this provision to remain a part of our laws for any greater length of time than would be necessary, and that would be determined, in my opinion, by the length of time that would elapse before conditions return to a normal state.

I want to say in all candor to the Senator that I fully understand that the Senator does not like this provision at all; and I do not like it, except for this particular purpose.

Further on Mr. McCumber said:

Further, I want to say to the Senator from New Mexico that when Congress thinks it ought to change this law it can do it. It can do it in one year or in two years, and I think it is better to leave to Congress the duty of ascertaining and determining when it is longer necessary or proper to continue this power; and that time will be, as I have suggested, when we have reached a more normal condition.

Further on Mr. McCumber said:

The reasons given by the Senator do not appeal to me. It seems to me that we may trust Congress and trust the President, whether he is Democratic or Republican, to carry out the law until Congress repeals it, and we can trust Congress to repeal it whenever the conditions justify it.

Why, even my good friend from California [Mr. Short-RIDGE], one of the distinguished members of the Finance Committee, who voted to make the time two years, said:

Personally, I am at this moment inclined to favor a limitation as to the time of the power which is here proposed to be delegated under the pending amendment.

And all the arguments that were made at that time were that the provision was adopted by the Finance Committee to meet an extraordinary condition in world affairs, purely temporary in character, and that it would be repealed whenever those conditions warranted. So, Mr. President, that being true, it seems to me that there is no better time to repeal the provision than now.

After the Senate, by a vote of 2 to 1, adopted the provision limiting the power to two years, the matter went into conference between the House and the Senate. The conference committee included my distinguished friend from Utah [Mr. Smoot], the distinguished chairman of the Senate committee at that time, Mr. McCumber, and the distinguished chairman of the House committee, Mr. Fordney, with his high ideas of extreme protection. Of course, with those gentlemen on the committee, you can imagine what happened to the limitation when it got into conference. It went out, just as the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] respecting trust-controlled goods and a consumers' counsel and the flexible provisions that we incorporated here, and many other provisions went out of the Smoot-Hawley bill when it was considered by the conferees.

So, Mr. President, we seek to restore to Congress at this time the power to pass on these rates after they are determined by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. President, I have a very strong conviction that if this proposed legislation can become the law, it is going to do more to stabilize tariff legislation than anything else we could do. I appreciate, and I am sure my friend from Indiana [Mr. Watson] appreciates, that it is almost impossible for a committee, without expert advice, to write tariff duties on the basis of difference in cost of production here and abroad. The Tariff Commission has had a great deal of friction in years gone by. They have had their controversies there. They have had them over the question of transportation and innumerable other things that arose that really caused hard feelings and jealousies within the Tariff Commission. But in this legislation we lay down so plainly and so particularly what factors the Tariff Commission shall consider in ascertaining differences in cost here and abroad that we will eliminate in the future, or ought to eliminate in the future, any friction within the membership of the Tariff Commission.

For instance, until we passed the Smoot-Hawley bill there was nothing in the law prescribing to what extent transportation should be taken into consideration by the commission in ascertaining the difference in cost of production here and abroad. The Tariff Commission had gotten into innumerable squabbles as to where the transportation charge was to be applied—whether it should be applied to the port of New York, even though that might not be the consuming area; whether it should be applied to San Francisco, which might not be the consuming area; or whether on a domestic matter, such as sugar, it should be applied from Utah or Colorado to Chicago, which might be the consuming area, or whether the domestic producers should be given the advantage of applying it all the way from there to New York, where the Cuban sugar comes in. So we laid down in this legislation, so that no expert would have any doubt about the meaning, the definition of transportation charges and where those things shall apply.

We go farther. In days past the Tariff Commission, in trying to ascertain the difference in cost, have not taken into consideration the economic location of the particular domestic industry that they were considering. They have not taken into consideration the efficiency of that particular industry. We say that when the difference in cost of production here and abroad is to be ascertained, it ought at least to be applied to efficiently operated industries here, as well as to economically located industries here. That is an innovation in the law. It is one of the real safeguards that will take care of the consuming people in this country when we commence to fix rates upon the basis of difference in cost of production here and abroad.

I recall, in serving on the agricultural subcommittee of the Committee on Finance, I believe, during the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley bill, that some sugar interests, for instance, from Indiana came before our committee, and the facts disclosed that they operated for only six weeks in the year; and they wanted such a tariff duty on sugar as would permit them to make a profit running only six weeks in the year! If this bill is passed, they can not do that, because either they are inefficiently operated or they are not economically located.

It will be recalled that during the consideration of that tariff bill in 1929 the glass people, for instance, wanted a very high duty on certain kinds of glass. It was shown that the American Window Glass people operated old, antiquated machinery; but the Libbey-Owens people, who had for 10 years amassed tremendous profits and declared abnormal dividends, their stock rising away up, making tremendous amounts of money, had adopted the new and modern method of machine blowing the glass, and so forth. Here was one part of the industry that was losing money, and here was another part that was making money. Consequently, the people operating in the old, antiquated way wanted a high duty in order to protect them, which would have given still higher dividends and greater profits to the Libbey-Owens people, who had the modern machinery.

I am glad to know, if I read correctly and my information is correct, that the American Window Glass people and the other parts of the industry that operated in the old, archaic fashion have now adopted the modern method; but if this law is passed, the commission will investigate, not these old, inefficient methods, not the uneconomically located plants, but the efficiently managed and economically located institutions, and ascertain the difference in cost of production on a consideration of those matters.

So, Mr. President, the other things are clarified in this provision that lays down the factors that the Tariff Commission shall investigate in ascertaining the difference in cost.

One of the differences between the Senate substitute offered by the minority of the Finance Committee and the House bill is this, and it is most important:

We state that after the commission ascertain the difference in cost, they shall go beyond that, and they shall make a report to the Congress with their findings; and as to that report for the guidance of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate the substitute says:

In connection with its investigations as to differences in costs of production the commission shall inquire into the following matters and shall include in its reports pursuant to this section a summary of the facts with respect to such matters.

These are the things they are going to report to us, so that we can have the data upon which to write the fair and the just duty, and ascertain the difference in cost here and

(1) The efficiency and economic operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration;

(2) The conditions of such domestic industry with respect to profits and losses, the extent to which productive capacity is utilized, and the extent of unemployment—

Very splendid factors to be considered in determining what rate should be imposed upon importations into this coun-

(3) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be due to foreign competition or to other specified factors;
(4) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be remedied by adjustments in the tariff law, taking into consideration the substitution of articles used for the same purposes as the articles under consideration, and taking into consideration any other pertinent competitive factors; and

(5) The effects of any proposed increase or decrease in rates of duties on other domestic industries and on the export trade of the

Mr. President, a tariff commission as it is to-day by law charged with the duty of ascertaining the difference in cost, with broad discretionary powers given to it as to what factors shall enter into the ascertainment of those cost differences, without the power to consider, as it does not consider, the amount of importations that come into this country or the amount of exportations that we send abroad, without considering the efficiency and the economic operation of the industry, can not ascertain the right rates to put on a commodity. But when an expert commission ascertains for Congress the cost differences and gives us all the facts enumerated in the five provisions I have read, then we can intelligently pass on the question as to whether the particular rate ought to be reduced or increased, or whether the commodity ought to be put on the free list, or whether it ought to be taken from the free list and put on the dutiable list, and so forth.

So it seems to me that if we could have legislation like this passed, if next year we got ready to pass a revision of the tariff rates, we would have the basis upon which to work intelligently in fixing the rates.

I do not go so far as to say that in every case where there is a difference in cost of production in this country and abroad we ought to put a duty of that amount on the article. I think there are other factors to be considered. I see no reason in the world to put a duty on a product of this country when we are supplying the markets of the world with it, and there are no importations or no appreciable importations of that particular product or thing into this country. Neither can I see any reason for imposing a duty at the customhouse on any article or any product that is flowing into this country, which our people need and must have, which we can not produce here economically and in fact do not produce in this country. In my opinion, in the ascertainment of these cost differences, and in fixing our rates, we must take into consideration the amount of importations of an article, the amount of exportations of the article, and all the other factors that enter into the consideration of that particular question.

So much for that, Mr. President.

That, in a nutshell, is what we expect to do.

My distinguished friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] spoke over the radio the other night. I see that Mr. Jekyll Jahncke of the firm of Jahncke and Hyde, in speaking somewhere in the North, says that the Democrats have been in control of the House now for several months, and that they have not yet brought out a tariff bill to reduce a rate. My friend from Indiana says that many of these Democrats have talked about the monstrosity of the tariff, but have not tried to reduce rates.

We could not please the Senator from Indiana under any circumstances. When we go along conservatively and try to act wisely and fit up a vehicle to study facts relating to costs of production, and the many prerequisites to proper consideration of the tariff, so that we can intelligently pass tariff legislation, they criticize us, and if we go in and cut rates and slice rates on this and that article, they say that they are doing it without the facts, and, "just as Democrats always do, they act the fool." That is what would be said. But here we propose wise legislation, which ought to appeal even to the conscience of a hardened Senator like my friend from Indiana. Yet he grabs it as a reason for criticizing. We appreciate the attitude of the President. When he signed the Smoot-Hawley legislation, we knew and the country knew where he stood. It would be, under the circumstances, a waste of time to legislate rates, knowing that the President would veto the legislation. We will wait for a more propitious day, and from all indications it will not be long.

I read the speech delivered by the Senator the other night. I have a copy of it here. It is wonderfully strange what my friends get away with. They have fooled the people so long, and they fool them so often, that they think they can fool them all the time.

Here is the speech my friend delivered during the Lucky Strike hour. I do not know why he picked on the Lucky Strike hour. [Laughter.] It is a long speech, and he delivered it well, as he always delivers a speech. But here is the species of argument employed by my friend on that occasion. The people over the country, unsuspecting as they are, listening in from their humble homes, or in their fine mansions, or in their counting places everywhere, get the words of my friend. He said this:

The first contention of the opposition with reference to this law is that it is not a limited revision as demanded by the President.

He was speaking about the Smoot-Hawley tariff law.

What is the fact? In a report after the law had been in operation a year the Tariff Commission found that of the 3,300 dutiable items mentioned in the Fordney-McCumber Act 890 were altered and 2,170 unchanged.

Does not the Senator think that was going pretty far when 890 items were increased? Is it the conception of the distinguished Senator from Indiana that that was a limited revision of the tariff, with 890 rates raised in that particular law?

He said further:

The second charge is that the duties in the present bi'll are unreasonably high, having been unduly increased; but the commission found that in the value of total imports the duties were raised upon 23 per cent, while upon 77 per cent they were either unchanged or lowered.

An unsuspecting person, hearing those tremendous figures, hearing the statement that the duties were raised upon only 23 per cent, while on 77 per cent they were either unchanged or lowered, would not get the real picture. I am wondering what part of that 77 per cent he speaks of as unchanged or lowered were lowered in that tariff act.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARRISON. In one moment, when I finish. Then it will call for an explanation from the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. It calls for an explanation now.

Mr. HARRISON. It will call for an explanation. Let me read it again.

But the commission found that in the value of total imports the duties were raised upon 23 per cent.

Of all the imports into this country, he said, whether they were on the dutiable list, whether they were on the free list, or what not, he says, of all the dutiable imports, the rates were raised upon only 23 per cent.

That means on all the rubber that comes into this country, which in some years amounted to more than $500,000,000 worth. It means on all the tin that comes into this country, which mounts so high in figures. On all of the coffee that comes in free, as with tea and with silk, in some cases having mounted to $400,000,000 worth. All those are included in his figures. He says that if we take all those imports, dutiable and undutiable, we find that the rates were raised on only 23 per cent. That is the kind of argument he uses in trying to fool the people, and it is possible to fool some of them, and my friend is so adroit that he can fool more than anybody else I know of.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator ought to couple with that the other statement in the speech, that of all the imports coming into the United States, 70 per cent come in absolutely free.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course; I do not know the exact amount, but one of the things that has made our people great and this country strong and wonderfully influential is the fact that our manufacturers import so much raw material. They have to do it. We would not have the great automobile industry if we did not import rubber free of duty, because we do not produce it in this country. We have to have raw silk, we have to have tin, we have to have these things which come in free, many of which go into the manufacture of the finished products here which have made great American industries, notably, the automobile industry. Of course, many raw products that formerly came in free are now on the dutiable list, thus adding the cost to the manufacturer and transmitted to the consumer.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator know of any Republican who has ever proposed putting a tariff on those things, the like of which we do not produce in the United States?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, now the Senator is trying to get out of the dilemma. I congratulate the Senator that he never has suggested putting a tariff on rubber.

Mr. WATSON. No; that is right.

Mr. HARRISON. He never has suggested putting a tariff on raw silk.

Mr. WATSON. That is right.

Mr. HARRISON. But when the Senator talked over the radio to give facts to the American people, stating that on only 23 per cent of the total importations were the rates raised, why did he not say what the percentage of increase was on all the dutiable articles coming into this country?

Mr. WATSON. I did in part of the statement.

Mr. HARRISON. Where is it?

Mr. WATSON. I have it in the speech. The Senator knows my speech better than I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I know it, because the Senator has made it so often. Let me proceed. The Senator said:

The third charge is that, while the President asked in his message that the tariff be revised in the interest of agriculture, yet the manufacturers had fared better than the farmers of the country; but the Tariff Commission reported-

Listen to this-

But the Tariff Commission reported that 93 per cent of the increases are upon products of agricultural origin, while but 7 per cent are upon commodities of nonagricultural origin.

That sounds pretty good until one analyzes it. Sitting and listening in one says, "Is it a fact that 93 per cent of the increases were on agricultural products?" That is what the Senator said. He has clothed it in such fine-spun language that what he says is probably true, but when we analyze it, it will not hold water.

"Ninety-three per cent of the increases are upon products of agricultural origin." That means wool; that means cotton; that means sugar; that means everything that is built up on an agricultural foundation. That applies to all the rates in cotton manufactured articles; all the rates on woolen manufactured goods; all the rates on these other articles which are taken originally from some agricultural origin; and he tries to make the people believe that 93 per cent of these increases were on agriculture.

That is one time when the Senator from Indiana and the President of the United States agreed on a matter, because President Hoover, in a message he delivered to us at one time, said something like that. Oh, if we listen to the weekly song of Julius Klein, we find he talks about that all the time. He is the greatest propagandist the Republican Party ever had. He is the highest priced prima donna, because I doubt not that he gets a fee for this propaganda he shoots weekly over the radio. I saw somewhere that he was on his way out West now to deliver a lecture to somebody at $1,000 per lecture. He is doing pretty well! [Laughter.] So my friend from Indiana agrees with the President of the United States once, and they both agree with Julius

Klein; and if the facts were known, the President and the Senator from Indiana both got their inspiration and their juggling of facts from Julius Klein.

That is the kind of speech the Senator made over the radio the other night, and that is the character of speeches he will make in the coming campaign, trying to hoodwink and trying to fool somebody.

The Senator made another speech. It will be recalled. Mr. President, that when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was before us, how my friends the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson] and some others on the other side painted the necessity for that tariff. And Grundy was here then; he did not talk much. but he knew how to play the ends against the middle. They told us that the country had to have that law; but that if it passed, we would have prosperity again in the country. When we started the consideration of it, we did have prosperity.

Of course, they disagreed with a thousand economists, but I want to read some of the things those economists prophesied at that time. In a letter to the President of the United States they prophesied economic wreck and ruin to this country if the Republican Party persisted in its work in passing that law. They prophesied the closing of industries in this country, they prophesied the increase of unemployment in this country, they prophesied bitterness in the hearts of foreign people, and retaliatory measures upon the part of foreign governments, if that legislation were enacted.
